The object of the measure is obvious. It is to allow a pension of a dollar a day for the remainder of his life to every honorably discharged soldier who served ninety days or more in the field during the civil war. Substantially the same relief is provided in numerous other bills proposed by Members of the House, but those interested in the effort to secure more reasonable legislation for the veterans of that rapidly vanishing army which mustered under the Stars and Stripes from 1861 to 1865, have been profoundly discouraged by the announcement, issued apparently on authority, that no amendment of the present law will be favorably recommended at this session of Congress.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENDALL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEISSE. How much money would that bill which you advocate take out of the Treasury to pay a dollar a day?

Mr. KENDALL. I have no hesitation in saying that the amount necessary is largely problematical. The best estimate I have been able to obtain is that it would require $6,000,000, but I am not appalled at that amount.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman means $6,000,000 in addition to the amount now appropriated?

Mr. KENDALL. I mean $6,000,000 in addition to the amount now appropriated, but it must be remembered that that appropriation will gradually decline as the veterans pass on, and they are now passing on with great rapidity.

Mr. WEISSE. Is it not a fact that from 1893 to 1897, the four Democratic years, the total pensions paid to soldiers was $614,972,794.85, and in the last four years it amounted to only $610,349,500, while all the other appropriations have increased from 50 to 350 per cent?

Mr. KENDALL. I will say it is always disagreeable to me to remember those Democratic years, but I doubt if the figures of the gentleman are correct. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEISSE. They are absolutely correct, according to the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions, and I hope the gentleman will take the trouble to verify them.

Mr. KENDALL. In any event, whatever money was paid was paid as the result of Republican legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the proposition embraced in the measure I have offered could be submitted to the American people to-day it would be approved almost without division—East as well as West, North as well as South. Since the introduction of this bill it has been indorsed in letters received by me from every section of the country. Some of these letters come from men who were with Grant in the decisive battle of Shiloh; some come from men who were with Sherman in his memorable march to the sea; some come from men who compelled the evacuation of Vicksburg; some come from men who were with Meade when the invasion of Pennsylvania was repulsed; and some come from men who were present when the colors of the confederacy were finally furled at Appomattox.

I believe the soldiers of the country are unanimous in the hope that the principle embodied in this bill may be speedily enacted into law. I know there is powerful opposition, some of it captious and some of it sincere, to the measure I have proposed. But the conviction is general throughout the country that if the Government of the United States is ever to allow further benefits to the men who maintained its emblems from the Ohio to the Gulf, that provision must be adopted now. The veterans are disappearing with a mortality which is amazing, and which must increase appallingly in the coming years. Since January 1, 1909, more than 52,000 have crossed the dark river to a reward more certain and more commensurate than any dispensed by human governments. The generation now entering upon the scene of action will witness the utter dissolution of the Grand Army of the Republic and the complete extinguishment of its membership. The surviving soldiers of the civil war are all old, many of them are physically infirm, and some of them are financially needy. It is asserted that the cost of living has advanced 35 per cent in recent years, and whether that statement be fortified by fact or not, it is undeniable that the pension of the private soldier, which often constitutes his only income, has not been augmented to correspond with changed conditions. We will appropriate for the current year for the support and expansion of our navy $135,000,000; for the maintenance and equipment of our army, $96,000,000. These enormous sums stagger the imagination, but they are granted without effective or considerable protest from any quarter. No war is imminent, for a profound peace prevails throughout the world, and all our mighty preparation seems wickedly wasteful when we reflect that the enlightened conscience of mankind will never tolerate another international conflict. The increase of expenditure which would be rendered necessary by the enactment of the bill I have introduced would be so modest as to be nominal when compared with the magnitude of our outlay for forts and fleets and battlements and battle ships. It could be provided for without detriment to the public service by a negligible reduction for the army or the navy, or both—a reduction which ought to be insisted upon in any event.

Mr. Chairman, more than two score years have elapsed since the last gun was fired in that fratricidal misunderstanding between the people of the North and the people of the South. It was a conflict unparalleled in the written records of the world. Whether estimated by the principles involved or by the sacrifices suffered or by the results achieved, it was unprecedented in the annals of humanity. It was a calamity unspeakably sorrowful, but inevitable as destiny. From the inauguration of Washington radical differences of opinion had existed as to the character of the Nation. One school of thought maintained that it was a voluntary association of sovereign States, subject to be dissolved at the election of any one or number of its membership. Another school of thought insisted that it was a union inseparable, indivisible, perpetual. Out of this disparity of belief, earnestly entertained and energetically defended, there arose, as the years elapsed, heated discussion, bitter controversy, crimination and recrimination; all to be adjudicated irrevocably, to be adjudicated forever, to be adjudicated right by the arbitrament of the sword.

When the surrender of Sumter was demanded, civilization waited with breathless anxiety for an answer to the question, Can the only government ever instituted deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal, preserve its own integrity among the peoples of the earth when assailed by domestic insurrection? The inquiry was immediate and it would not be postponed. The hour for argument in the forum had expired and the time for action in the field had arrived. It was a supreme crisis in the history of humanity—that crisis which wrenched and almost wrecked the American Republic.

But men appeared in response to the imperative summons of duty, men with muscles of iron and nerves of steel. They came from every city, from every town, from every village, from every hamlet; from the farm, from the factory, from the mine, from the store, from the school, from the bank; and they offered all that they were and all that they hoped to be freely to their country in its awful extremity. No hope of conquest, no ambition of office influenced their enlistment in the great army of freedom; nothing but the most ideal patriotism, nothing but the most devoted loyalty inspired their unfaltering endeavor. They discounted all difficulties which interposed, they laughed at all dangers which menaced, and the paltry compensation they were promised they considered not at all. The authority of their Government had been challenged, the flag of their country had been insulted, the perpetuity of their Union had been threatened; and without a thought of personal consequences, they hurried away to the wild, grand music of the war,

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

They were the very flower of the finest manhood of the North, and upon a thousand battlefields the valor, the endurance, the bravery they exhibited communicated a new and illustrious glory to the warfare of the world. On every tedious march, in every sweltering trench, at every deadly charge, always and everywhere, they achieved imperishable renown and rendered forever incomparable the heroism of the volunteer soldier. And they confronted an antagonist as brave, as determined, as valorous as themselves. Wherever the fearless daring of the South encountered the superb courage of the North there was blood and death and immortality. After four years of unequaled carnage they triumphed over a foe who would have been invincible against any other adversary, and the Union was preserved as the most priceless inheritance ever bestowed upon the sons of men. And when the cause of freedom had finally prevailed, when the spirit of the rebellion was completely subdued, when the indivisibility of the States was irrevocably established, they modestly discarded the uniforms they had made immortal, silently substituted the implements of peace for the armaments of war, and quietly resumed the employments of civil citizenship. That was over forty years ago. The more than four decades which have intervened since that April afternoon when Lee surrendered his shining sword to Grant have been busy with these cherished veterans. The brow has wrinkled with increasing years, the hair has whitened with advancing time, the body is bent with the burden of life. Their ranks have been disabled by disease and decimated by death. The departed are enshrined in a Nation's reverence. The surviving are embraced in a country's love.

And what was the proximate result of their historic heroism? A single commonwealth with a single flag and a single destiny; one common country extending from ocean to ocean and from Superior to the Keys, without a master and without a slave; peaceful, united, prosperous; the most powerful, the most enlightened, the most progressive people on the globe; a country in which life is secure, liberty guaranteed, property protected, labor rewarded, justice established, equity maintained; a country of schools and churches and homes, in which education is free, the Bible open, and the fireside sacred; a country which at this moment enjoys the most perfect civilization ever attained in the history of mankind. And who is responsible for this beneficent condition? I canonize the private soldier who battled in the great war for the Union. This is his contribution to the happiness of humanity, to the welfare of the world. And shall the Government for which he rendered such inestimable service now hesitate to reward him suitably as he approaches the twilight of life, decrepit with years and enfeebled with disease? Every pecuniary obligation incurred in the overthrow of the rebellion has been fully redeemed. Every financial demand has been satisfied. There remains but a single debt which has not been paid. It is one which never can be entirely discharged—the debt which our country owes to the gallant men who preserved its life in the awful years from Fort Sumter to Appomattox. They suppressed an insurrection without a precedent and without a parallel. They saved a Government which is rich enough and strong enough and just enough now to render unto them the reward to which they are so abundantly entitled. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for one amendment contained in this bill to the present law. It is the proviso found on page 26 of the bill, and provides that after the beginning of the next fiscal year it shall be unlawful for the Government to engage in the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes containing thereon a return card of any firm, corporation, or individual. It seems to me, and has seemed to me for quite a number of years since I have been acquainted with the practice of the department, that it was unjust, that it was unfair, for the great Government of the United States to enter into competition in the way of printing return cards on envelopes with the people ordinarily known throughout the country as the country printers. In every community and hamlet of the United States, as a rule, the man who is doing more for the upbuilding of his community and the advancement of his town or his city, occupying almost a semipublic position, is the editor of the country newspaper. The compensation of his avocation or business is not very great under the most favorable circumstances, and it seems to me to be very unjust that the Government of the United States should undertake to enter into that line of business in every village and town of our country, thus taking away from him and from under him—the publisher of the country newspaper—the opportunity of his livelihood and a portion of the means belonging legitimately and properly to his business and his profession. This particular provision in the bill, gentlemen will observe, is subject to a point of order.

I sincerely trust that no man will make the point of order when we reach it; but I want to say that if it does go out on the point of order, I have an amendment which is not subject to a point of order, which, if I can get recognition from the Chair, I expect to offer at that time, and which will, at least for the fiscal year which the bill covers, completely meet the difficulty and be a complete remedy at least for that length of time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman publish his amendment for the information of the House?

Mr. NORRIS. I will state briefly what it is: The committee amendment as contained in the bill will enact into permanent law an inhibition which we want; but my amendment, to avoid the point of order, could only apply to the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. It will be a limitation on the appropriation making it unlawful to use any of this money for printing return cards on stamped envelopes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I hope it will not be necessary for the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We will heartily support it over here, however, if he does.

Mr. NORRIS. I regret to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Department has been guilty, in my judgment, of unwarranted activity in the line of securing business in the way of printing of return cards on stamped envelopes. No one contends, who favors the proposition, that it brings any revenue to the Government. No one contends that it in any way helps out the deficit in the Post-Office Department. On the other hand, it must be, and it is, admitted by all who will give it a thought that this very activity practiced by the Post-Office Department of our Government does seriously interfere with and does take away the legitimate profit and the legitimate business of every man engaged in the newspaper business. I want to read to the House some of the arguments made by the present Postmaster-General in favor of the continuation of this practice.

I have quite a lengthy communication or a copy of it written to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in which he makes, I presume, as good an argument as can be made in favor of the continuation of the present practice. I find that during the present fiscal year there was appropriated and there is applicable for this particular purpose funds as follows. Mr. Hitchcock says:

> Selling price of all these envelopes for fiscal year mentioned, $30,068,584.77. The postage value was $28,072,108.63, leaving for the cost of manufacture and distribution $1,996,476.14. The contract cost of manufacture was $1,264,677.54, leaving for cost of distribution $731,798.60.

The Postmaster-General says in this letter that stamped envelopes present many advantages. In passing, I want to make this statement, that the enactment into law of the amendment proposed by the committee or the one I shall propose will not do away with stamped envelopes at all.

We should not get the idea that if the Government is prevented from printing the return card on stamped envelopes that it will necessarily follow that there will be no stamped envelopes issued. As a matter of fact, I think if this proposed change in the law should be enacted there will be greater convenience on the part of the public who use stamped envelopes than there is now. It is a well-known fact that when any business firm, corporation, or individual orders stamped envelopes from the Government it requires in some instances months before the order can be filled. It would be an easy matter for the Government to keep on sale at every post-office in the land stamped envelopes, and the business man who desires a return card printed thereon could go to the post-office in the morning and buy a quantity of 500 or 1,000, carry them across the street to the country printer, and before 4 o'clock in the afternoon the stamped envelopes, with the return card printed thereon ready for use, could be delivered at his desk. He can not do that at the present time.

I know it is said—and it is said in the letter from which I have read an extract—that the cost would be greater. This is probably true, but to a very limited extent. But, as a matter of fact, on principle the Government of the United States has no moral right to go into any line of business and do the work of that business at actual cost, resulting in the taking away of the business from its own citizens and thus depriving its own people of an honest livelihood. But it would also follow that what little additional cost there was, the business man who uses the envelope would have the knowledge that every cent of that extra cost remained in his own town, remained in his own vicinity for the upbuilding or the sustaining of the business that does more for the uplift of his community and his town than any other business within it.

Now, the Postmaster-General says also in his letter, speaking of stamped envelopes—

> They are the best size and shape for handling.

I submit, gentlemen, that this is no argument why the business should be continued by the Government. It is said in another place in this letter that all the work is done by private parties, by one private corporation, under contract with the Government. There is no reason, as I said before, why the same size and the same quantity of stamped envelopes should not be sold by the Government. There is no reason—and as a matter of fact it exists now—why the same quality and the same size envelope should not be on sale in every store and at every news stand in every town in the land. The sale of stamps is a legitimate governmental function as carried on through the Post-Office Department, but what excuse can be given for the Government to enter into competition with the country printer and drive him out of his legitimate and chosen profession? Especially is this true when the business can do no possible good to the Government, but often results in actual financial loss, as I shall show. I can see no more reason why the Government should do printing for the people than to manufacture clothing for its citizens or with its mighty hand to give a monopoly to some corporation to make all the typewriters for use in commerce.

The Postmaster-General further says in the same letter:

> The Government does not, however, compete with private enterprise in the issuance of stamped envelopes for the reason that these envelopes are manufactured under a private concern. The only difference between the business methods of this corporation and those of any other printing or envelope concern is that it receives its orders from the public through the Post-Office Department instead of directly from the consumer, because of the safeguards which must surround the production and issuance of stamps. If the furnishing of return-card stamped envelopes were discontinued, it would simply take away the business from one private concern, especially equipped and organized to handle it economically, and divide it amoung other private concerns.

I submit that this is no argument for the continuance of the business by the Government, but on the other hand it is one reason why the Government should discontinue this practice. The effect of the Government's operations in this line is to give one private concern a monopoly of the entire business. One of the objects of the amendment is that instead of giving this one private concern a monopoly the business shall be divided up among the local printers and publishers in the various communities where the envelopes are to be used. It is absolutely wrong, in my judgment, for the Government to, in effect, organize and sustain this monopoly at the expense of the printers of the country, whose legitimate business and whose honest living are thereby interfered with. It is undoubtedly true also that the Government loses some money on a portion of this business.

A great many orders for stamped envelopes with return card thereon are orders for 500 envelopes. When they are furnished in small lots like this, my understanding is that the envelopes are sent under the frank of the Post-Office Department through the mails. Inasmuch as the actual work is done without profit to the Government, it necessarily follows that the hauling of this material through the mails increases to an appreciable degree the deficit now existing in the Post-Office Department. It is time that this injustice that has too long existed should be remedied. It is time that the Government, especially where there is no profit in the transaction to the Government, should discontinue its interference with the legitimate and honest occupations of many of its most worthy citizens. It is but an act of common justice and fairness, and only the enforcement of a square deal to the great army of editors and publishers in all the towns and cities of our land that I ask Congress to enact this provision into law.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10106. An act authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from the Woman's Relief Corps, auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, of a proposed gift of land contiguous to the Andersonville National Cemetery, in the State of Georgia;

H. R. 19067. An act to authorize Thomas J. Ewing, George B. Patton, Otto Burger, William Cecil, and Milton E. Foster to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River;

H. R. 17160. An act to authorize the Oregon Trunk Railway, of the State of Washington, to construct a bridge across the Columbia River and Celilo Canal;

H. R. 16364. An act to amend in part section 658 of the Revised Statutes; and

H. R. 970. An act for the relief of Edward C. Kittle.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in line with the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I send to the Clerk's desk a letter to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALTON DEMOCRAT,
Alton, Iowa, January 31, 1910.

Hon. E. H. HUBBARD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If Congress hasn't passed a law prohibiting the Government from printing envelopes, you tell it I want one passed right away. I have a job of printing 500 envelopes in sight, and if the Government will keep hands off I will land it sure as fate, and make 30 cents on it. If the Government butts in and does the job for nothing I lose the 30 cents on that job, and the next duffer who comes along and gets envelopes will want me to print him a batch of soap wrappers for nothing, because he could have gotten the envelopes "cheaper from the Government," and so on, ad infinitum to Gehenna and back. See how it works? Tell Congress I'm a lone Democrat in a county that's lousy with Republican editors, and I need the money. Tell it the surplus in the Postal Department can be applied on the Panama Canal, if it doesn't know what else to do with it. Tell it anything—just so you entertain it till I get that job of envelopes. Besides, I object to having this great and glorious Government squander its resources competing with my shop. If it should go broke, I would get the blame. Tell the Government if it has a stock of trust-made envelopes on hand that are going to be a dead loss when it stops its job press that I will mortgage my plant and take a couple of boxes. Give my regards to the President and Uncle JOE CANNON and Brothers PAYNE and ALDRICH.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. B. WOLF.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CROW].

Mr. CROW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this House to what seems to me to be a great and expensive mistake. It is not my desire to make play to the galleries by abusing any corporation, but in view of the fact that the President has recently recommended that the postage on newspapers and magazines be increased, because of the loss this Government sustains in carrying them in the mail at the 1-cent-per-pound rate, it seems proper to me that I make a few remarks on the subject.

I fully agree with the President that there is a great loss in carrying that class of mail at the present rate, especially when it is hauled any great distance, but I am sorry to say that I must disagree with him in the remedy he offers.

I have heard many able Members of this House say this Government pays too much to the railroads for carrying the mails. I have heard just as able Members say that the railroads are not paid too much for carrying the mails. I have not heard any Member give definite proof that the railroads are paid too much nor have I heard any Member give definite proof that they are not paid too much.

I unhesitatingly say they are paid too much, and I intend to give what I believe is definite proof that this is a fact. I am going to go a step further and say that if the roads were paid a fair and only a fair price for their services in carrying the mails there would be no loss to the Government in that service, but that the deficit now found in the Post-Office Department would be wiped out and a surplus appear instead. I realize fully that this is a broad assertion, but I shall endeavor to prove it, at least to my own satisfaction, and I shall propose a method of having the mails hauled which will be just to both the Government and to the railroads and at the same time save this Government at least $25,000,000 a year.

I shall read to you a part of a circular sent out by a committee of railroads called "the committee on railway-mail pay," which attempts to prove that the railways are not paid enough for the cars in which the mail is hauled:

IMPROVIDENT RAILWAY MAIL CONTRACTS.

RAILWAY POST-OFFICE PAY.

(A) It is the popular impression that the compensation paid the railroads for railway post-office cars is a rental simply. Nothing could be more erroneous. The pay covers not only the exclusive use—a very small part, indeed, of the expense to the carrier—but the very burdensome and expensive duty of hauling the car—a fully equipped post-office on wheels—in fast passenger trains in which mail is assorted and distributed en route by a corps of clerks to expedite its delivery at intermediate points and terminals. These cars are hauled in trains, next to baggage cars, with ample cubic capacity to carry all mail tendered, and to earn all transportation charges prescribed by law, but for public convenience the department provides these moving post-offices, weighing 12.4 per cent of the average passenger train. For the use and cost of hauling this car, ridiculously inadequate railway post-office pay is allowed.

Exhibit C shows that for a 60-foot railway postal car the carriers receive 5.5 cents per mile hauled, according to the scheduled railway post-office car rates. These cars weigh about 50 tons.

You will notice that this statement says these cars are both furnished and hauled by the railroads at the present rate per car per mile, and that a 60-foot car weighs 50 tons, or about 100,000 pounds. I have no reason to deny that a 60-foot car weighs 50 tons, but I believe that is more than it weighs. There are not many 60-foot cars used anyway, and I believe the weight of the average car in which mail is hauled is about 40,000 pounds, although it would make my argument stronger should I place the average at twice that amount.

Assuming that 40,000 pounds is the average weight of all the cars used by the roads, I am informed that we pay only a little more than $5,000,000 a year for having that 40,000-pound car furnished and hauled. I am also informed that we pay about $43,000,000 per year for the hauling of the mails in those 40,000-pound cars, and that the average amount of mail hauled in these cars is about 5,000 pounds. Thus we pay less than $6,000,000 per year for the hauling of 40,000-pound cars and more than $40,000,000 for hauling 5,000 pounds of mail in them at the rate per hundred pounds.

Mr. ELVINS. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CROW. I yield.

Mr. ELVINS. Do we pay more, proportionately, for hauling mail by the pound or hundred pounds than we do by the carload?

Mr. CROW. Yes.

Mr. ELVINS. Why is that, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. CROW. The rate per car, as I would suppose, is easily figured. The rate per hundred pounds I have never yet found anyone who can tell whether that is right or wrong, but in making a comparison of the rate of mail hauled as compared with the rate of the car it seems to me to prove it is a great deal too much.

Now, if any member of the Post-Office Committee or anybody else can give me any reason why we should pay seven times as much for having 5,000 pounds of mail hauled as for having the 40,000-pound car hauled, I would be glad to hear him. It may be difficult to see that the larger weight I refer to is of the car itself and not of the mail hauled in the car. Can you not see that it would cost the railroads about the same to pull the car empty as it does to pull it with the mail in it?

But granting that we pay the railroads as much for hauling the 5,000 pounds of mail as for hauling the 40,000-pound car, we would then only pay about $11,000,000 per year for having the mails hauled, instead of the fifty millions per year which we are now paying.

Now, the remedy which I propose is that the railroads be paid at the rate per car only and not anything at the rate per hundred pounds. In justice to the railroads, I believe it would be necessary if paid per car only that the present rate per car be increased very largely, possibly doubled, and that a just and equitable rate be made for the space used when a whole car is not used; but even then we would cut the amount down to between ten and fifteen million dollars per year instead of fifty millions, which we now pay. There is another argument in favor of this method of remuneration, and that is that we would not have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars every year weighing the mails, with the risk of having them padded by the railroads during the weighing periods.

Should my proposition become a law, we would not have to worry about the loss in carrying second-class matter, for there would be no loss, nor would we have to worry about any any deficit, for we would have none; nor would we need to fear raising the salaries of the rural carriers and the letter carriers, nor would we need to fear raising the salaries of railway postal clerks and passing a law allowing them half pay while sick or crippled to such an extent as to render them unable to work temporarily.

I have no desire to criticise the railroads for accepting all this Government will give them for any service which they may perform, but I can see no reason why we should needlessly waste money by giving them three or four times as much as it is worth to carry the mails, and then stint ourselves and finally be forced to discontinue establishing rural routes altogether. I think the railroads have been a great blessing to this country, and they have certainly done their share in the development of the country, but so have the pioneer farmers and lumbermen and factory men. I do not wish to be understood as standing in the way of the development of this great country, but our President has correctly said that we should economize, and I believe in taking him at his word. I do not believe, however, in building up the railroads nor any other kind of corporations at the expense of the rural routes, rural carriers, letter carriers, railway mail clerks, nor even the newspapers, for I believe in a higher education of the people, instead of checking the present progress made by them in enlightening the people along all lines.

Digressing a moment from my main line of argument, I would recall a statement of a prominent Democrat in my district who not long ago gave as his opinion on recent Republican victories in Missouri that the establishment of rural routes and other modern mail facilities which bring information to all classes of residents there was responsible. Unconsciously he admitted that general education brought about Republicanism. And so it is my opinion that since under Republican administration this country has seen its greatest and most wonderful development, and that since the Republican party is responsible for all the facilities in postal and other services which have tended to bring about that wonderful development, we should curtail in no wise these facilities, but rather build them up still further. We certainly should not raise the rates of postage on newspapers. If that deficit must be wiped out, let us remove the chief cause of it—the exorbitant pay to railways. Newspapers certainly do their share toward educating the people. Education and Democracy do not go together, but, on the contrary, education and Republicanism go hand in hand.

Ignorance breeds Democrats, but education breeds Republicans.

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with much that has been so well said by my friend who has just taken his seat. I believe that the Rural Free Delivery Service is meeting the expectations of the people and doing a great deal of good throughout the country. The Congress made no mistake when it adopted the rural free-delivery policy. I would not curtail the service. I am in favor of extending it. I am with the farmers of the country in this matter, and I am in the fight to the end.

However, I want to say again what I have frequently said before, and that is that the rural carriers are not paid sufficient wages to live on decently, especially the carriers who have families to support. I have here a statement which shows that the average net earnings of the rural carrier is only $31.50 a month. Now, in my judgment, with the increased cost of living mounting higher and higher all the time, it is absolutely impossible for these carriers to live on the little stipend they are receiving.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the gentleman mean that the average net earnings after deducting the cost of the rural carrier's equipment is only $31.50 a month?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; that is just what I mean. I am receiving letters from rural carriers almost daily complaining about the poor pay they are now receiving, and I will read two or three of them as samples.

Mr. FASSETT. Are they from the gentleman's district?

Mr. SULZER. No; I have no rural carriers in my district, but I think I have received some from the district of my colleague.

Mr. FASSETT. Those letters have been in the RECORD three times already.

Mr. SULZER. I think not; but reiteration in the cause of justice may hasten justice. I am talking for the good of the country generally, and I wish others would do the same.

I now send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read in my time, the statement and the letters to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statement showing the average net earnings of rural letter carriers, after providing and maintaining the equipment necessary for the performance of their duties, for six months ending December 31, 1909. HATTIESBURG, MISS., January 23, 1910.

MY DEAR SIR: My sympathy goes out to every rural carrier in the land. I have been through the mill. Three years is enough for me. I commenced to carry mail on route 1, March 1, 1907, and I am going to quit when I have served three years. I hate to be a quitter, but I can't afford the job any longer. Meat, 25 cents per pound; corn, $1 per bushel; lard, 18 cents per pound. If I hire a carpenter, I must pay him $3.50 per day. The doctor charges $2.50 for a visit; a little sick spell in the family means about $50. To have my fireplace fixed I must pay 50 cents per hour. If I hire a negro for common labor, it is $2 per day. There are only three in my family. How the boys live that have five and six in the family, I can't see.

Waiting for Congress to do something for us is like looking for gold at the end of the rainbow. The army, navy, and Panama Canal, etc., need too much money. Congress seems to go on the principle that anything is good enough for the farmers.

Just so long as the people are willing for army and navy officers to live in luxury, just so long as vast sums are fooled away in Panama and elsewhere, why, just that long will the rural carriers have to patch up old harness with tacks and strings.

After three years' service as a rural carrier, I can not imagine how any young man who wants to do something for himself or family can stay in the service.

I visited one of Uncle Sam's war ships at New Orleans, and when I saw how lavish your Uncle Samuel was with his naval officers and men, I naturally thought of the boys in the Rural Service who have a close shave to make both ends meet.

Farewell, boys! I hope to meet you all in a better world, where you will have a better show for comfort than you have here below.

W. E. OLDHAM,

NEW AUGUSTA, IND., January 26, 1910.

DEAR SIR: I have been keeping an itemized account of my expenses for several years and can show what every penny was spent for during that time, and no honest Congressman, Senator, President, Postmaster-General, or any other honest man with a heart, can look me square in the face and tell me I lived too high or spent my money foolishly.

For the year 1908 I came out in the hole to the amount of $10.60, and for the year 1909, after earning quite a little for odd jobs outside of my salary, I had only $36.40 to lay up for a rainy day or old age. Isn't that encouraging?

When I started carrying the mail, four years ago, I had a nice bank account started up, but it soon started down. Now, my dear friend, you can use this to help the poor fellows out who still hang onto their routes, if you want to, but for me the chances are nine to one my resignation will be on its way to headquarters before you receive this.

In closing, I wish the boys who hang on like a dog at a root the best of good luck, and you, Mr. Editor, and your paper, I wish the same good luck and a grand success.

Yours, very truly, LESTER P. AVERY.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, those letters—and they are only samples of many—and that statement corroborate all that I have said about the meager pay of the rural carriers. These men can not live on the pay they are getting. The force is in a panic. Many are resigning, claiming that the high cost of living and the bad roads for man and beast makes it impossible to live upon the paltry sum the Government pays for the service. The rural carriers must be paid more or the service must be crippled, and the people will never consent to the latter proposition. We must pay the rural carriers decent wages. That is all I want to say now on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department is a great department of the Government. It comes closer to the people than any other governmental department. It is practically self-sustaining, and if it were administered in a businesslike way it would be self-sustaining. That is all the people want and expect of the Post-Office Department—to have it economically administered in their interest along business and not political lines. If this were done it would be self-supporting, and all the clerks and carriers would be better paid and work shorter hours.

The people will always take an abiding interest in the Post-Office Department. It is preeminently their department. It comes in touch with almost every man, woman, and child of the country, and they are deeply interested in its material welfare. I am now and always have been in favor of the employees of the Government being paid decent salaries, so that they can live respectably and clothe and feed their children and send them to school, so they will grow up to be good men and women. The salaries we are paying the rural carriers, the post-office clerks, and the letter carriers of the cities are not sufficient to maintain them or their families, especially in view of the tremendous prices for the necessaries of life, which are getting higher and higher every day under Republican legislation. [Applause.]

In this connection there is a matter germane to this legislation that I referred to briefly yesterday, and that is the establishment in the Post-Office Department of a parcels post. I believe from investigation, and I have been informed by men who are competent to judge intelligently, that if the Government established a parcels post in the Post-Office Department the revenues from it would be sufficient not only to pay the rural carriers decent wages, but to pay better salaries to all the letter carriers in the cities and to all the post-office clerks and at the same time materially shorten the hours of toil. There is no valid reason in the world of which I am aware why there should not be a parcels post in connection with the Post-Office Department. The people want it and have been demanding it for years. They are insisting upon it from all parts of the country, and every year the Post-Office Committee of the Congress of the United States has turned a deaf ear to their entreaties, pigeonholed their petitions, and refused to grant their requests.

There must be some potent reason for this, and I have looked into the matter sufficiently to find out the reason. The sole objection, so far as I can learn, is that the express companies of the country, who are now doing this business at a great profit, do not want the Government to do it. The express companies are charging the people exorbitant rates for carrying small parcels into the country districts. The Government could do it for about a quarter of the cost and make a substantial profit. Why should not the carriers on the rural routes carry parcels? The record shows that these rural carriers convey only about 25 pounds a trip, and that generally only one way. They could easily take about 250 pounds a trip with their horses. They ought to be allowed to do it, and I say here and now that there is no reform in connection with the post-office administration so urgently desired by the people who live in the country districts as the establishment of a parcels post. It would be great economy to all concerned—not only the people, but also to the Government—and it would in a thousand ways materially help the people as well as the Government. Nearly every European government has a parcels post in connection with its post-office department. The United States is far behind the times in this matter. We must be up to date. This postal reform is bound to come.

The people demand it, and what the people want they generally get, especially when their demands are just and the proposition is right, the express companies to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time an illuminating editorial written by Arthur Brisbane, the able and fearless editor of the New York Evening Journal, and published in that paper on February 24, instant.

The Clerk read as follows:

MASS MEETING ON THE PARCELS POST TO-NIGHT—IT OUGHT TO BE INTERESTING; THE LACK OF A PARCELS POST IS NOT SO MUCH A DISGRACE TO OUR GOVERNMENT AS IT IS A DISGRACE TO OUR PEOPLE.

[Copyright, 1910, by the New York Evening Journal Publishing Company.]

At Cooper Union to-night at 8.15 there will be a mass meeting to consider the question of postal parcels delivery "in its relation to the economy of the Nation."

The meeting has been organized by John Brisben Walker, who has a faculty of seeing things clearly and discussing them energetically. The Postmaster-General has been invited to attend and answer some questions. He probably won't be there.

Here are some questions that the people ought to ask:

Why do the departments of government, from the greatest, such as the Post-Office, down to the least, consider first the interests of the few that live on the people, and, last of all, the interests of the people themselves?

Why does the Government refuse to carry parcels for the people, when the carrying of such parcels would increase the comfort and business of all, reduce greatly the price of living, put the consumer in direct contact with the producer, kill off thousands of middlemen parasites and weaken the hold of the trusts that live by their control of the middlemen?

Why does the Government give a few exorbitant express companies a monopoly of business, with the opportunity to combine and charge extortionate rates?

Why does not the Government use for the people its carrying plant—the largest in the world—with its 60,000 fully equipped stations, its 60,000 paid managers, and more than a hundred thousand clerks?

Why does not the Government use for the people, in the distribution of parcels, buildings costing more than $200,000,000, and its great staff of inspectors, superintendents, lawyers, and detectives already under salary?

The people pay annually for the management of the post-office more than $240,000,000; the people lose a large sum on this. Why are not the 30,000 post-offices made into distributing stations for parcels and, incidentally, into receiving stations for the public savings?

Why does the Government send on its rural free-delivery routes thousands of horses and wagons every day, carrying loads averaging only 25 pounds per horse, when, without any extra cost whatever, those free-delivery wagons could carry 100 times as much, oblige the farmers, who pay the expense, and cause the post-office to be run at an enormous profit instead of a very great loss?

Why does our government post-office limit the parcel that it will carry for the ordinary citizen to 4 pounds, while European postal service carries trunks and heavy parcels of all kinds?

Why does our government post-office, in carrying the small parcels that it does carry, charge a thousand per cent more for the service than the German post-office?

Why is it possible for a Scotchman living in Edinburgh to send a package across the Atlantic Ocean and through our American mail across the American continent to Seattle—why is it possible for that Scotchman to send that parcel 6,000 miles, including 3,000 miles of travel in the American post-office, for less than a man living in New York can send the same parcel to Jersey City?

There are some questions that ought to be answered. One answer, too complete, unfortunately, can be given right here. The answer is:

The United States post-office is run largely to oblige the express companies and to permit robbery by the railroad companies, because those that manage the express companies and the railroad companies exceed in intelligence and determination the ordinary voters; because the big man that manages the corporations is the intimate friend and constant associate, and often the owner, of your political bosses and your men in office.

The people are exploited; they are made fools of by the big, cunning accumulators of millions, because the people divide up like sheep into different flocks at election time, and they vote blindly and stupidly.

They discuss their grievances between elections and forget them on election day. And, what is more, the average citizen is so busy chasing the individual dollar that is to go into his own pocket that he has not time to give real attention to the individuals that are chasing the millions and the hundred millions.

Go up and hear the discussion to-night at Cooper Union if you want to. A big crowd might do some little good. But remember that the chief difficulty is with the people themselves. One of the truest things ever said is that men get just about as good a government as they deserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that biting editorial speaks for itself more eloquently than any words of mine. It expresses my sentiments, and if I am any judge of public opinion in this country, I believe it voices the sentiments of seven-tenths of the people of the United States who live outside of incorporated towns and cities. I am glad of this opportunity to put it in the RECORD for all to read and to ponder. As I have said, there is no reason in the world why there should not be a parcels post as a part of the post-office system. It was recommended by Postmaster-General Wanamaker. It has been advocated for years by Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General De Graw.

Its economies and advantages were fully set forth in a very elaborate argument by Postmaster-General Meyer, but for some reason inexplicable to me the Post-Office Committee of this House turns the proposition down and refuses to bring in legislation to do it. If an amendment to this bill were in order to accomplish it I would offer such an amendment, but it is not in order. I do not want to unjustly criticise the Post-Office Committee, but I want to give its members timely warning now that if they do not bring in a bill ere long for the establishment of a parcels post they will hear something drop at home that will make some of them sit up and take notice. The time has come when they must heed the voice of the people, and not listen longer to the fallacious arguments of the express companies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as my time is limited, I will ask that I may be permitted to proceed uninterrupted; and if I have any time left after concluding what I have to say, I shall then be very glad to answer any questions that may be propounded.

I send to the Clerk's desk a copy of the Chicago Record-Herald of February 18, 1910, and ask to have read the article which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

ONE MAY NOW WRITE LETTERS BY TELEGRAPH—NIGHT EPISTLES, SENT BY WIRE BUT DELIVERED IN FIRST MAIL, IS WESTERN UNION PLAN—PHONE IS TO BE UTILIZED—ITS USE AS FEEDER FOR MORSE SYSTEM IS TO RECEIVE THE FIRST TRIAL IN CHICAGO.

[Special to the Record-Herald.]

NEW YORK, February 17, 1910.

Several new features for the convenience of the public are to be introduced by the Western Union Telegraph Company as the result of its alliance with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. The first of these is a new service called the "night letter," whereby 50 words can be sent by telegraph at night for delivery early the following morning at the same price as the customary 10-word day message.

The next step will be to utilize the telephone as a collector of telegraph messages, so that there will be no necessity of going in person with the written message to offices and paying the charges over the counter. It is planned that any telephone subscriber can call up a Western Union office, dictate his message, and have it sent. The charges therefor will be rendered at the end of the month with the regular telephone bill.

This system will be tried first in Chicago, where the arrangements already have been made for the experiment. If successful there, it will be established in other cities.

The company's official announcement concerning the "night-letter" service is as follows:

"That, in addition to the forms of service heretofore authorized, a 'special night-letter' service be established as soon as practicable.

"The charge for this service shall be the standard day rate for 10 words for the transmission of 50 words or less, and one-fifth of such standard day rate for 10 words shall be charged for each additional 10 words or less.

"'Night letters' shall be written in plain English. Code language is not permitted.

"'Night letters' will be received not later than midnight to be transmitted only for delivery on the morning of the next ensuing day.

"'Night letters' may, at the option of the telegraph company, be mailed at destination to the addressees, and the company shall be deemed to have discharged its obligation in such case with respect to delivery by mailing such message at destination, postage prepaid."

WILL UTILIZE IDLE WIRES.

A greater part of the vast telegraph system, crowded to capacity during the day, lies idle at night. The new management figures that at small additional expense these idle wires can be made to earn something and also accommodate the public.

Messenger-boy delivery, which is costly, is to be done away with by use of the post-office. The "night letters" will be placed in the local post-office at point of destination in time for postmen to take them around on the first morning delivery of the regular mails. Where there is no free delivery, messengers or the telephone will be utilized.

Another plan of great magnitude now being worked out is to have every city, town, and village, and even farmhouse, in the entire United States in touch with telegraph and telephone communication at all hours of the day and night.

CAN USE WIRES ALL NIGHT.

At present all telegraph offices, save those in the central parts of cities, close at 6 or 8 o'clock in the evening. Most of the world is cut off during the night. The telephone company offices everywhere, however, are always open for business. Anyone wishing to send a telegraph message after the Western Union office is closed can give it to the telephone company, which will transmit it to the nearest all-night telegraph office for transmission to point of destination.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk, also, an article from the New York Times of February 19, 1910, and would ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

TELEGRAPH LETTERS SHOULD BE POPULAR—COMPANIES INITIATING THE NEW FORM OF SERVICE EXPECT ALMOST EVERYBODY TO USE THE WIRES, EVEN TO THE FARMHOUSES—FIFTY WORDS AT NIGHT FOR THE COST OF TEN IN THE DAY—BY TELEPHONE FROM HOUSE TO TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

Letters by telegraph are expected to become a popular means of communication after a while. That is the idea the directors of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Western Union, which now belongs to the first-named company, had in mind when they decided upon the fifty-word night letter as a new feature of the telegraph service. The additional facilities that the telephone company was able to supply were counted upon to make it easy for the sender to get the letter from his house to the wires.

The night-letter system is scheduled to start some time within a month.

It is to be handled in combination by the telegraph and telephone when that is the quickest and most convenient way. When it reaches its destination in the early morning hours it is put in the mails there and delivered in the first morning distribution.

In announcing the new service the company stipulates that only plain English letters will be received. Code words are excluded. The rate for 50 words is to be the same as the day rate for 10 words, and one-fifth of the day rate is to be charged for each additional 10 words or less.

"We are inaugurating this 'night-letter' plan in order to keep our idle wires busy at night," said an official of both the American Telegraph and the Western Union Telephone companies yesterday. "It will be a great economy to business men and an additional convenience to them.

"Messages handed in at a Western Union office in one city up to midnight will be transmitted to destination with customary rapidity. The office of destination will place the messages in stamped and addressed envelopes and messengers will carry them over to the local post-office, depositing them before 3 a. m., long before the first morning mail goes out.

"The 'night-letter' service is really meant for letters. It insures quick transmission. If I send a letter from here to St. Louis, for example, by mail to-day it will reach its destination to-morrow afternoon, and may not be delivered until next day. If I send the same letter by our 'night-letter' service this evening the letter will be delivered in St. Louis to-morrow morning in the first mail."

People who live remote from the telegraph office, where the telegraph office closes early in the evening, are to have city accommodations under the new plans that have been worked out. They may call up the Bell Telephone Company "central" in their locality and dictate their telegraphic messages. "Central" will communicate the message to the nearest office of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and it will from there be dispatched to its destination over the telegraph wires.

As the American Telegraph Company's offices in the big cities are open day and night, every private person who has access to a Bell telephone may send a telegram to any distant part of the country at any hour of the night. The answer also can be delivered back to the sender over his telephone by telephone "central."

The rates to be charged for this combination of telephone and telegraph service have not yet been worked out, but it was said yesterday that they would not be high.

Edward J. Nally, vice-president and general manager of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, said yesterday that the idea of a night letter service was not new, having been discussed by telegraph men for years. For his company he had made an exhaustive study of the question, however, for the purpose of finding out if there was a demand for such a service, and the reports he received were that what the public wanted was not a deferred service, but an instantaneous service, the result being that the Postal Telegraph last August installed a special rush service, under which they undertake to handle messages between all important places, from customer to customer, within twenty minutes. This service, Mr. Nally said, was an instant success. Facilities by which persons having telephones could get in touch with remote telegraph offices at all hours of the night, Mr. Nally added, had been furnished by his company for some time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And also I send to the Clerk's desk an editorial from the New York American of February 22 of this year, that I would like to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the article will be read in the time of the gentleman.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A CHALLENGE TO THE WESTERN UNION.

The Western Union Telegraph Company announces that it is going to transmit 50-word messages at regular day rates if filed between 6 o'clock in the evening and midnight.

The question is, if this corporation can profitably send 50 words for 25 cents during six hours of the day, why can't it afford to do the same during the other eighteen?

There is a company in existence that can. The Telepost Company, which uses the Delaney automatic system, with a sending capacity of 2,000 words a minute, has been doing as well as this or better for the last year between Boston and Portland and between Chicago, St. Louis, Indianapolis, and other points in Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri.

And the Telepost Company asked the same rate between its two most distant points as between those that are nearest together, just as the United States mails do.

Colonel Clowry, president of the Western Union, told a New York state legislative committee the other day that the rates of his company were as low "as are consistent with good business management." Perhaps so, if good business management means squeezing the public for all the traffic will bear.

But Clarence Mackay told the same committee that his Postal Telegraph Company had forced down the rates of the Western Union by competition.

Presumably the rates stand where they are because the Postal has ceased to compete.

The competition of the Telepost Company begins where the Postal Company left off. It is said to be making huge inroads in Western Union business between the points where the new company is in operation.

Before the Telepost stops competing and goes into the combine the country has a chance to learn its lesson. And the public service commission of the future should make their legal applications of that lesson.

Sixty-seven years ago—on February 21, 1843—Representative John P. Kennedy, of Maryland, arose in Congress and moved for the appropriation of $30,000 for a government test of the merits of the Morse system of telegraphy. Peals of derisive laughter greeted the motion.

But the world has moved since then. And if cheap telegraph service can not be got from private corporations, the people have a great public corporation that will provide it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the Western Union Telegraph Company ought to be congratulated for imitating its young rival—the Telepost—in adopting this, its new feature, for the convenience of the public. But it is to be regretted that they could not have seen their way clear to have made this and other concessions to the public before they were practically forced to do so by the entrance of the Telepost into the city of Chicago.

The "night letter" referred to in the article which has just been read by the Clerk will be transmitted between midnight and morning, and 50 words will be sent at the rate charged for 10 words during the day. These "night letters" will be delivered at the post-office at their destination in time to go out by the first carrier deliveries. The company announces that the messenger-boy delivery, which is costly, is to be done away with by the use of the post-office. The system is to be tried first in Chicago, and, if successful there, it will be established in other cities.

Compare this service in this respect with the service of the Telepost Company, and you will at once see that the Telepost ought to be encouraged in every reasonable way to extend its lines to every part and portion of the country. Here are the Telepost rates:

In addition to the address and signature: Twenty-five-word telegrams, any distance, 25 cents; 10-word telecards, any distance, 10 cents; 100-word teletapes, any distance, 25 cents; 50-word telepost, any distance, 25 cents.

Compare this last proposition with the proposal of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and you will observe that the Western Union Company is not able to cope with the Telepost. Take, for illustration, the proposition of the Western Union Telegraph Company to send a "night letter" of 50 words at the same price as the customary 10-word day message. This would mean that this "night letter" from New York to San Francisco would cost $1 as compared with 25 cents—the price fixed by the Telepost—and many such comparisons could be made in all sections of the country showing the decided advantage that the Telepost has now and always will have over the slow hand methods of the Western Union Company, and it never will be possible for the Western Union Company to compete successfully with the Telepost. We no longer rake hay with the old wooden rake, nor cut our meadows with a scythe, nor reap our grain with the old-fashioned cradle. We use the up-to-date methods of machinery in rakes, mowers, and binders, and why should we not pursue the same methods in telegraphing and use machinery in sending our telegrams, and thus encourage and adopt the Telepost system, which can send a thousand words in a single minute over a single wire?

You will also note that the proposition of the Western Union Telegraph Company limits the sending of the 50 word so-called "night letter" to the time between midnight and the morning, whereas by the Telepost you can send these letters any time during the day or night, which is another decided advantage of the Telepost over the concession of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

I can not conclude this brief statement without calling attention to the fact that it seems almost a pity that the great journal in which this article appears prominently on its front page has not long since seen fit to give a like space in as prominent a place to its readers describing the advantages to be secured through the Telepost. It is to be further regretted also that the leading newspapers of the country do not take the same keen interest in the establishment of postal telegraph, or at least in the reduction of telegraph rates, that they did some years ago when men like Greeley, Storey, Prentice, Forney, Childs, Medill, Abell, McCullough, Bennett, Raymond, and William Cullen Bryant, and other great editors wrote the editorials in the newspapers, and I can account for it only in one way, and that is, then the editors wrote their convictions, while now, in many cases, they write what they are told to write.

I will be glad if the chairman or some member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will inform us as to whether any steps have been taken on the part of the committee looking to the establishment of a postal-telegraph sysem in this country, or a reduction in the telegraph rates. I am aware of the fact that we will be confronted with the statement that, even if it was found to be feasible, there is a deficit in the Post-Office Department and that the revenues of the Government will not permit of the Government engaging in the work of postal telegraphing. But I beg to remind the gentlemen of the committee that if Australia, with an area practically as large as that of the United States, and with only about one-sixteenth of the population of the United States, can establish a postal-telegraph system and make it profitable with the very low rates which exist in Australia, then no good reason can be assigned why a similar system should not be adopted in this country. Just for a moment let us look at the rates in Australia.

If Washington were located in Australia, we could send a 16-word message, in addition to the address and signature, for 12 cents in the city of Washington, and for a radius of 10 miles around. Have we anything in this country to compare with this? Australia has six States, three of which are two and one-half times as large as Texas. South Australia has a greater area than all the 26 States east of the Mississippi River.

West Australia has an area even greater than all of these 26 States with any one of the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Arkansas, or Louisiana added.

West Australia is more than one and one-half times larger than North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas.

Larger than Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Idaho, Utah, Arizona, Washington, and Oregon.

Three and one-half times larger than Texas.

Six times larger than California.

Nine times larger than Colorado.

Ten times larger than either Idaho, Utah, or Oregon.

Fourteen times larger than either Washington or Missouri.

Sixteen times larger than either Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Arkansas, North Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, or Florida.

Almost twenty times larger than New York.

Twenty-one and one-half times larger than either Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee, or South Carolina.

Twenty-nine and one-half times larger than Maine.

Notwithstanding the area of this and other States, you can send a telegram in any one of the States of Australia, in addition to the address and signature, of 16 words for 18 cents, and it will be delivered within a radius of 1 mile from the receiving office, and for this there is no extra charge.

No one will contend for a moment that we have anything comparable to this in the United States. I have only to call your attention to the fact that in the smallest States we pay, in addition to the address and signature, 25 cents for 10 words, and in some of the larger States as high as 40 cents.

Let me cite just one case: In New York the population is 39 times that of West Australia; yet, in area, it is not one-twentieth as large. Why should not the people in the State of New York enjoy even cheaper rates than they do in Australia?

Remembering, as I have said before, that Australia is practically as large as the United States, lacking in round numbers only about 14,000 square miles, in addition to the address and signature you can send a telegram of 16 words for 24 cents anywhere in Australia. In all cases the charge for extra words beyond the 16 is a uniform rate of 2 cents a word, while in the United States it is from 2 to 7 cents. For a moment compare these rates with the extortionate rates of either the Western Union or Postal Telegraph companies, and what other conclusion can we honestly come to than that there ought to be a very substantial reduction in telegraph rates in this country.

When it is remembered that Australia, as a whole, is a country of the same area as the United States, and that the distances actually traversed are very much greater than those between any points of telegraph communication in America, it will be seen that the charge of 24 cents for a 16-word message is very much less than one-half, and would probably work out at about one-third, the amount charged in America.

Australia borrowed $18,000,000 at 3 per cent interest and established its system of telegraph lines, and I have no hesitancy in saying that if this country so desires it could borrow the money at 2 or 2¼ per cent interest with which to purchase the lines of either the Western Union or Postal Telegraph Company, or build a line of its own, and could still increase the Australian prices to the people of this country and in two years wipe out the entire cost, in addition to the annual expense, and in the third year and for each succeeding year could pay any reasonable annual deficit in the Post-Office Department.

The telegraph lines now owned and operated by the federal government for the people of Australia have a length of fully 48,000 miles, while the length of the wires is considerably more than 100,000 miles. Thus it will be seen the people of Australia and their government have a considerable experience in the cost both of constructing and operating a telegraph system. The mileage of their lines is actually greater than that of any European country, with the exception of Russia, Germany, and France, while in proportion to the number of inhabitants it is probably nearly six times as great as that of any other country in the world, with the single exception of its near neighbor, New Zealand. There are upward of 3,000 telegraph stations kept open for the convenience of a population which does not exceed 4,000,000, and the revenue derived from messages is shown to be sufficient to defray the cost of operating and maintaining the lines, as well as defraying the interest charges on the cost of construction at the annual rate of 3 per cent.

In Australia the telegraph and telephone services are both incorporated with the post-office, and as such they require few, if any, separate offices. There are fully 3,000 telegraph stations in the country for the convenience of the public, and nearly every one of these is also the district post-office. There are in the United States about 27,000 telegraph stations, but there are not less than 70,000 post-offices for the use of the people—that is to say, there is a post-office for every thousand, but a telegraph station for every three thousand. In the newer, poorer, and far less thickly settled country of Australia there are fully 6,000 post-offices to meet the requirements of 4,000,000 people, or one to every 666 people, and more than 3,000 of these are also telegraph stations, being 1 to about 1,300 persons. The contrast is suggestive, but it is most suggestive of all in its financial aspect. If every second post-office in this country were also a telegraph station, the public would be nearly as well supplied with the means of rapid communication as the settlers in Australia now are, instead of one-third as well, and they would also be saved a great deal of money. In America it would then be, as it now is in the commonwealth of the South Pacific, each telegraph station would be at the natural center of population, where it would require no separate offices and no separate staff of clerks and operators, except in cities of considerable size. Every country postmaster or clerk would in that case be required also to be a competent telegraph operator, and thus an endless duplication, both of offices and officials, would be avoided.

I give it as my deliberate judgment that from this time on no public building known as a "post-office building," should be built in this country that does not make ample provision for caring for the necessary amount of help and other facilities that may be needed when a postal-telegraph system is adopted in this country, for I am more and more convinced that unless the people can get the relief which they feel they are justly entitled to, that it will only hasten the time when the Government will be compelled to adopt a system that is enjoyed by every civilized nation on earth.

I desire to call your attention to a recent Associated Press dispatch, sent out from New York on January 21, which reads as follows in the Washington Post of January 22:

> The Postal Telegraph Company will be the last competitor in telegraphy, and when that competition ceases there will be a choice only between monopoly and government ownership. * * * This is Clarence H. Mackay's view of the telegraph situation in the United States, as expressed to-day before a committee of the state legislature which is trying to determine the advisability of placing telegraph and telephone under state regulation. * * * As president of the Postal, he was reiterating that keen competition between his company and the Western Union would continue, and by reason of this competition he said rates had been reduced from 20 to 50 per cent.

I addressed a letter to Mr. Clarence H. Mackay, president of the Postal Telegraph Company, New York City, February 4 last, calling his attention to the above dispatch, and said to him that I would like to ask him a few questions, and would thank him for an early reply; so far I have not received any. My first question was, Why have not the telegraph companies of New York been under the control of the public-service commission in that State, as are other corporations?

Second. Why are you seeking to defeat the efforts of Governor Hughes in this respect, that both the Postal Telegraph and Western Union may be under the supervision of the public-service commission of New York?

It is due Mr. Mackay to say that since I wrote him he has been quoted in the public press as saying that he would not oppose the placing of the Postal Telegraph under the public-service commission of New York.

Third. Can you give any good reason why both of these corporations should not be under the supervision and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Fourth. You speak of competition between the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies. Will you kindly suggest where it exists? For illustration: Is it possible to send a telegram by either of these companies from Washington, D. C., to any village, city, or hamlet in the Union where there is the slightest competition; or, on the other hand, is not the rate exactly the same in every case? And if the same is not true of other cities and villages throughout the country, I would most respectfully thank you to call my attention to the same.

Fifth. Will you kindly tell me when it was that, by reason of competition or otherwise, telegraph rates were reduced from 20 to 50 per cent? I understand that, whether by competition or otherwise, rates have been increased and not decreased.

Just a word to all those who are in no way interested or connected with the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies and their allied influences, which are many. If we are to succeed in securing this further right and blessing to the people, then we must unite all our efforts, for, as was and is to be expected, these great corporate influences are being exerted to the end that they may crush out any and all attempts to encroach upon the exorbitant rates which they are charging the people.

In conclusion I want to say, however much we may wish that it were otherwise, we must not lose sight of the fact that there is an ever increasing and growing demand in this country for a substantial reduction in telegraph rates, a marked reduction in express rates, and for the establishment of postal savings banks and a parcels post. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT ILLUSTRATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Ordnance, a report of tests of iron and steel at the Watertown Arsenal.

The SPEAKER. There are illustrations with this letter. If there be no objection, the same will be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what is it?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

> Letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Ordnance, a report of tests of iron and steel at Watertown Arsenal.

Mr. FINLEY. What will be the cost of printing with the illustrations?

Mr. SULZER. No matter what the cost is, it ought to be printed. It is a very important document.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed as to the cost. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 26, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF WORTHLESS PAPERS.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged report (No. 561) from the Committee on Accounts.

House resolution 373.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ 10 laborers for a period of two months at a compensation at the rate of $60 each per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, said laborers to be employed exclusively in the handling and disposition of worthless documents, in compliance with House resolution 220.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman how long are these employees to be paid for?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Sixty days.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Sixty days, and no longer.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

TRANSFERRING DOCUMENTS TO HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged report (No. 565) from the Committee on Accounts.

House resolution 413.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to J. M. McKee $154, to P. L. Coultry $118.80, to August Ruppel $102.37, to S. L. Wilson $76.68, and to John Morrisey $76.68 for services rendered in transferring documents and other material from the annex folding room to the House Office Building, pursuant to the authority contained in the urgent deficiency act approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have some little explanation of that.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment before the report is read?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as a member of that committee, after investigating this resolution very thoroughly, and having the matters before the committee which the report will disclose, these are the facts upon which the committee acted, upon which I acted, and upon which I apprehend the committee acted. These documents were stored in the annex folding room, which had to be surrendered on the 1st of September last, and transferred from that place over to the Office Building. Proposals were submitted to three companies that do that kind of business in this city to transfer them from that building over to the House Office Building. The hours of work of the transfer company were from 7 until 6. Under the law of the United States an employee of the United States does not work but eight hours. The hours of the office force here in the folding room were from 9 until 5. Now, when the bids were submitted, the disbursing clerk, Mr. Browning, informed these three bidders that the office would furnish these men to work overtime, in order that the work might be done; and with all of that information before them the lowest bid was a thousand and odd dollars lower than the next lowest bid. These gentlemen made a statement, which will be found in the report, which probably better be read after my statement. These gentlemen mentioned in the resolution worked overtime in the folding room in the arrangement of the books. Now, the employees of the transfer company—Messrs. Littlefield, Alvord & Co., who obtained the contract—are not skilled people, so far as handling this immense number of books is concerned. It required somebody familiar with their arrangement in order to have the books properly transferred and cared for from the office which is known as the "Southern Railroad Building" into the Office Building. These gentlemen frequently worked overtime up to 7 o'clock p. m. in the day in the removal of these books, and it is for the performance of this service that this claim is made, which will amount to a little over $400.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; of course.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman state that the employees of the House are covered by the eight-hour law?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That was the statement made to the committee.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the gentleman on a moment's reflection will know that the eight-hour law is not applicable either to Members of Congress——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I know it is not as to Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Or to the employees of the House, whose duty it is to be here, many of them as long as the House is in session. Nor do I understand that the folding room closes at 4 o'clock. It ought not to at least.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It does generally in the summer time, when Congress is not in session.

Mr. MANN. It may in the summer time, and they are closed a good part of the time then.

Mr. CURRIER. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that this caused these men to lose their vacation. They worked from 7 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening, sometimes the hours were longer than that; and their work expedited the business of removing the books so that it was not necessary to renew the lease for one extra quarter, otherwise the Government would have to pay $1,250 for a renewal of the lease for a quarter.

Mr. MANN. I certainly would be the last man to make any reflection upon Captain McKee. He is in every respect a most efficient man in the business; and, of course, if the committee say that he ought to be paid extra, very well; but I do protest against paying an employee of the House extra money simply because at some one time he happens to work a full day's work, when at another time he does not perform a full day's work.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me to make this explanation, I will say that the people who did this work are employed in the folding room. Their hours are from 9 o'clock until 4. There is no law, of course, to that effect, but that has long been the custom. In addition to that these employees work on piecework, and most of them, if they are energetic and active, get their work done in less time than that. Now, in order to save something over $1,400, these people agreed to work these extra hours with this transfer company, and in other similar cases it has been the custom to pay the employees for the overtime they work.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. When these books were moved up from some other place a resolution on the same basis was passed by the House.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the demand for the reading of the report of the committee, because, in view of the explanation which has been made, I do not think it is necessary.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

HANNA CORBIN.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following resolution (H. Res. 404) from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] presents from the Committee on Accounts the following resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk. (Report No. 562.)

House resolution 404.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Hanna Corbin, widow of Richard T. Corbin, late messenger janitor to the Committees on Reform in the Civil Service and Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, of the House of Representatives, an amount equal to six months of his salary, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the funeral expenses of said Richard T. Corbin.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the governor of the State of Indiana, which I ask to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). The gentleman from Indiana sends to the Clerk's desk a letter, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GOVERNOR'S ROOM,
Indianapolis, Ind., January 5, 1910.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to inform you that the State of Indiana, having heretofore accepted an invitation contained in section 1814 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America, and having placed in Statuary Hall in the Capitol at Washington, D. C., the statue of her illustrious war governor, Oliver P. Morton, the general assembly of said State, by chapter 102 of the acts of 1907, made an appropriation to procure a statue of Gen. Lewis Wallace to be placed in said hall. By virtue of said act of the general assembly of Indiana the governor of said State appointed John P. Megrew, William Allen Wood, and William H. Fox to constitute a commission to procure and have said statue erected. I am informed by the commissioners that the statue was made by Andrew O'Connor and that it has been duly placed in position and is now ready to be presented to you.

As governor of the State of Indiana it affords me pleasure to present to the Government of the United States the statue of Lewis Wallace, distinguished soldier, statesman, diplomat, and author. Permit me to subscribe myself.

Your obedient servant, THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Governor of Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration Senate concurrent resolution 19, and ask that it be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 19.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the thanks of Congress be presented to the State of Indiana for providing the statue of Gen. Lewis Wallace, a citizen of Indiana, distinguished as a soldier, diplomat, and author; and be it further

Resolved, That the statue be accepted and placed in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, and that a copy of these resolutions, duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that this resolution was before the Committee on the Library, and without objection that committee will be discharged from the further consideration of it, and it will be considered by the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the State of Indiana honors both herself and the Nation in selecting from among her distinguished dead Gen. Lew Wallace, whose pulseless counterpart has been placed in Statuary Hall—the Pantheon of the Republic—as a representative of that which is highest and noblest in American life. General Wallace was born in Brookville, in Franklin County, Ind., on the 10th day of April, 1827, and he died in Crawfordsville, in his native State, on the 15th day of February, 1905. Indiana was in the twelfth year of her statehood at the time of his birth, with a small and sparsely distributed population. He was the second son of David and Esther Test Wallace, who were pioneers in the young State and who contributed greatly toward the development of its rich resources. David Wallace was educated at the Military Academy at West Point through the favor of Gen. William Henry Harrison, and after completing the course in that institution he gave up arms and entered the profession of the law. He served in the Indiana state legislature three terms, was lieutenant-governor of the State two terms, and was Governor of the State one term. He was a member of this body for one term, and was defeated for reelection upon an issue that illustrates the incredulity of the public mind at that time respecting the practical value of electricity as a means of communicating intelligence. A measure was introduced providing for an appropriation of $30,000 to aid Professor Morse in establishing a telegraph line from Washington to Baltimore with the view of testing the utility and practicability of the telegraph, and it was referred to a special committee of five, of which Governor Wallace was a member. The committee made a favorable report and Congress made the appropriation, and the line was constructed. Governor Wallace's opponent in his campaign for reelection made the Morse telegraph the paramount issue of the contest. The voters of the district were persuaded to believe that telegraphy was a contrivance of the "evil one," a species of witchcraft to be shunned and condemned by all God-fearing people, and Governor Wallace was defeated by an overwhelming majority.

Gen. Lew Wallace educated himself for the law, and was engaged in the practice at Indianapolis when the Mexican war came upon the country. The quota of Indiana under the first call of President Polk for volunteers was three regiments, and the young lawyer at once closed his office and began campaigning for recruits. The three regiments were quickly organized and set off for the field of action, Wallace carrying a commission as second lieutenant in the First Regiment. That regiment was assigned to guard duty chiefly and took no part in any serious engagement. The Second and Third Indiana regiments participated in the desperate battle of Buena Vista, where the Mexicans under command of Santa Anna were defeated, although they outnumbered the Americans over 5 to 1.

The Second Indiana Regiment was assigned a position in defense of a battery which provoked a furious attack from the Mexicans, in overwhelming numbers, and while the regiment was gallantly maintaining its position under a galling fire, its colonel, in the belief that the battery had fallen back, when in fact it had advanced, ordered his regiment to "cease firing and retreat." The regiment retreated in disorder and did not further participate in the battle as an organization, but practically all of its survivors at once joined other regiments and bravely fought to the end of the bloody conflict. In his official report of the battle, Gen. Zachary Taylor, who was in command of the American forces, placed the stigma of cowardice upon the Second Indiana Regiment, and in the light of events that clearly showed its injustice, he stubbornly refused to remove it. That aspersion was keenly felt and righteously condemned by all Indiana soldiers as a cruel injustice. General Wallace made a careful investigation of the facts at the time, and they clearly showed that there was no braver organization on the field than the Second Indiana Regiment. It entered into the conflict with only 360 men in line, and its losses in killed and wounded were 107, about 30 per cent of its entire active force. There was only one other regiment in the engagement whose losses were as great.

General Wallace was intense in his nature and he had a passion for justice. He never forgave General Taylor for the flagrant wrong he did the Indiana soldiers at Buena Vista. His father belonged to the Whig party and General Wallace's inclinations were to that party, but when General Taylor was the Whig candidate for President in 1848, he not only refused to support him, but went into the campaign actively against his election, and while Taylor was elected, he felt much satisfaction in the fact that the electoral vote of Indiana was cast for Lewis Cass, General Taylor's Democratic opponent. General Wallace affiliated with the Democratic party from that time until the civil war. It would be unjust to his high character and patriotism to say that he became a Democrat through his dislike of General Taylor.

During the exciting political decade beginning with 1850, with its intense and acrimonious controversies in the federal legislative forum, General Wallace was associated with such conspicuous party leaders as Jesse D. Bright, Ashbel P. Willard, Thomas A. Hendricks, and Joseph E. McDonald. On the slavery question he was a constitutionalist and a supporter of Stephen A. Douglas's doctrine of "squatter sovereignty." He supported Douglas for the Presidency in 1860, but after the beginning of the civil war he became a Republican and acted with that party in the main until his death. In 1860 party politics became largely a matter of latitude, and it has remained so, more or less, ever since.

General Wallace was not a politician in the common understanding of that term, although he was more or less active in every political campaign. He regarded party organizations as mere agencies to promote the common good, and he never defended or apologized for wrong for party's sake. He was thoroughly democratic in spirit. His political creed was that the chief duty of government is to secure to every citizen, without regard to birth or color, rank or fortune, an equal opportunity with every other citizen in the exercise of those fundamental rights and privileges that are necessary to the highest and best use of the talents committed to his keeping, be they many or few. He was passionately devoted to the Government and the maintenance of law, and yet he believed that every individual was endowed with those inalienable rights that were necessary to the fulfillment of that destiny appointed to him by Almighty God, and that it was as great a wrong for the Government itself to invade those primary rights as it was for an individual or a combination of individuals to do so.

When fraternal ties were sundered with sectional discord and civil war burst upon this fair land with cataclysmal fury General Wallace was one of the first to offer his services in defense of the Union. He was engaged in the trial of a case in court at Frankfort, Ind., when he received a telegram from Governor Morton that Fort Sumter had been fired upon by foes of the Union, asking him to come to Indianapolis at once. He arranged with his associate counsel to assume sole charge of the case, and he took the first train to the state capital and reported to the governor for duty. He was commissioned colonel of the Eleventh Indiana Infantry, organized under President Lincoln's first call for volunteers, and was assigned to service in Maryland and Virginia. His regiment rendered conspicuous service under its first enlistment, although it was only of three months' duration.

General Wallace had a natural aptitude for the field; he possessed all the qualities for successful military leadership. He was methodical, aggressive, courageous, and discreet. He appreciated the value of discipline and all things that made for the comfort and efficiency of his command. He possessed the rare quality of being able to attract and hold the confidence and affection of his army.

At the termination of its three months' enlistment the Eleventh Indiana Regiment reorganized and reentered the service for a period of three years, with Colonel Wallace at its head. It was assigned to duty in the Southwest, and was in the campaign to open communication on the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers and participated in the capture of Fort Donaldson. Colonel Wallace was commissioned a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers on the 3d of September, 1861, and in March, 1862, he received his commission as major-general of United States Volunteers. He was in command of a division in General Grant's army at the battle of Shiloh. He had been stationed at Crumps Landing, on the Tennessee River, about 6 miles north of Pittsburg Landing, for several weeks before the battle, expecting an order to move on the enemy at Corinth. The confederate forces, under command of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, moved from Corinth in the direction of Pittsburg Landing, where the bulk of the Union Army was in camp, and opened attack early on Sunday morning, April 6, 1862. General Wallace was apprised of the battle by the incessant firing of artillery and put his division in condition to move, and eagerly awaited orders from the commanding general. He waited impatiently until about 11.30 o'clock, and then decided to move on his own order. Between Crumps Landing and Pittsburg Landing ran Snake Creek, upon each side of which was a large expanse of low marsh or quagmire, exceedingly difficult to cross. There were only two accessible bridges across Snake Creek over which the army could march with its artillery, and General Wallace decided to take the west one, because of the condition of the road. His army was well under way, when he was overtaken by an aide from General Grant's staff, with an oral order to retrace and approach Pittsburg Landing via the east road. By the time the army could turn back and traverse the 6 miles of swamp and quagmire over the east road it was nightfall and hostilities were suspended. General Wallace's division had no participation in the battle on the first day, but on the second and decisive day of the contest his division was actively engaged and performed valiant service.

Much has been said and written in criticism of the Union forces on the first day of that battle, and attempts have been made to involve General Wallace in culpability for his failure to reach the scene of action in time to engage in the first day's conflict. There was much confusion and lack of systematic execution on the first day of the battle, but certain it is that General Wallace was absolutely without blame or responsibility for his failure to arrive earlier. His own disappointment, though entirely free from self-reproach, was deep and lasting.

He was afterwards put in charge of the defense of Cincinnati at a time when that city was without protection and was threatened by a large force of confederates. In that work his capacity for organizing and executing plans of defense on a large scale and upon short notice was amply demonstrated.

His most important command was of the Eighth Army Corps, with headquarters at Baltimore, which was given him March 12, 1864. In July, 1864, a large command of confederates, hearing that Washington was inadequately defended, contemplated an attack upon the city before provision could be made for its protection. General Wallace surmised the purpose of the enemy and confronted them with a small army made up largely of inexperienced men, at Monocacy Junction, where he made such a stubborn resistance as to delay the progress of the confederates until General Grant could send an adequate force to protect the capital. General Wallace's plan of action at Monocacy was admirably conceived and faultlessly executed.

He was a member of the military commission that tried and condemned David E. Herold, Mary E. Surratt, and others for conspiracy to assassinate President Lincoln, Vice-President Johnson, and certain Cabinet officers. He was president of the commission that tried and condemned Capt. Henry Wirz, of the confederate army, who was in charge of the military prison at Andersonville, for cruel and barbarous treatment of Union soldiers who were prisoners in his charge. There are many now who feel that those convictions were the result of an abnormally excited condition of public feeling, as a sequel to the four tragic years of internecine conflict; but General Wallace, who brought to those investigations his training and experience as a lawyer, carried to the end of life an abiding belief that the judgments of the commissions were just and altogether righteous.

General Wallace resigned his commission in the army in September, 1865, and after spending some time in Mexico he returned to his home in Crawfordsville.

In 1878 he was appointed governor of the Territory of New Mexico, which position he occupied for about two years. In 1881 President Garfield appointed him minister to Turkey, and he remained at that post for four years. It is doubtful if any minister ever discharged the delicate duties of that position with greater ability than he did. Sultan Abdul Hamid at once became his warm personal friend, and the attachment continued during his entire service at that Moslem court. When General Wallace's service was terminated and he presented his letter of recall, the Sultan said:

> It is my wish to have the letter unceremoniously, for you must understand I regard you as more than a minister. Since I have been on the throne no foreigner has come to me officially, or in private capacity, for whom I have had the friendship I have for you.

Notwithstanding the strong personal attachment between the Sultan and General Wallace, he gave scrupulous regard to the interests of the great Republic whose honor and welfare he was charged to uphold.

General Wallace was educated for the law and was in the practice for several years, yet he did not achieve high eminence in that profession because he thoroughly disliked it. To use his own words, he regarded it as a "detestable business." The bickerings of the forum disclosing, as a rule, the ugly, uncandid side of human nature were peculiarly distasteful to him. His aspiration was to live above those ill-tempered controversies so common in the courts, where he might be able to reach the highest and best in life and promote a closer fellowship among mankind. While he achieved great prominence as a soldier and a diplomat, his tastes and talents found more congenial employment in the domain of letters. From his early youth he evinced a marked preference for literature, sometimes, at the expense of other branches of learning. His first important literary production was "The fair God." He began the preparation of that great historical novel in 1849 and had it published in 1873. That book met with high favor in the literary world and became immensely popular with all English-speaking people. Among many voluntary tributes to the merit of the book, I quote a letter from Sir Charles W. Dilke to Lord Dufferin:

> MY DEAR LORD DUFFERIN: I was very sorry to miss Gen. Lew Wallace, and, not having his address in London, not to be able to write to him. His The Fair God is, in my humble estimation, the best historical novel that ever was written; better than Romola, better than Rienzi, better than Old Mortality.
> Yours, ever sincerely, CHARLES W. DILKE.

While governor of New Mexico he entered upon the preparation of that sacred novel that appealed so powerfully to the popular taste and challenged the admiration of the critics—Ben Hur; A Tale of the Christ. [Applause.] He wrote that marvelous book without having visited Palestine, but depended for its setting upon his knowledge of history, geography, and, most of all, his deep insight into the life of the Savior, gotten from a study of the four Gospels. It was at once the most sublime and the most happily executed literary creation of the century. It carried fiction into a field that had remained fallow for centuries on account of its sacredness. The rare discrimination and reverential delicacy with which the subject was treated brings no offense to the most refined spiritual nature nor the highest standard of literary taste. It is a masterpiece of composition and construction, judged purely from a literary standpoint. Its antitheses of spirituality and worldliness, its climaxes of beauty and eloquence, its purity and grace of diction delight the artistic taste. But its strength and charm are powerfully enhanced by the subtlety with which it weaves into a complete fabric the purest love and the highest hope of the human soul. Its appeal to all that is tender and sacred in the religious life is simply irresistible. It is a book of the man as well as the scholar. It has been translated into 11 languages, and its popularity is not confined to the Christian civilization. To have been the author of that great work is a crown of glory as enduring as human civilization. We may do homage to the life and character of General Wallace by our memorials and statues, but Ben Hur will live long after our granite and marble shall have crumbled into dust. [Applause.]

General Wallace had little respect for religious dogma, ceremony, or ritualism, but he was a Christian in the broad sense that he lived the great truths of the Christian faith and philosophy. He absorbed them into his being and translated them into acts and deeds of Christian love and fellowship. The poet says:

The evil men do lives after them, but the good is oft interred with their bones.

That line is half truth and half error. No man ever lived who did not leave behind him an influence, good or bad, that will abide to the end of time.

The moving finger writes, and, having writ,
Moves on; nor all their piety nor wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all their tears wash out a word of it.

The good men do never dies. The virtues of our time are the sum of the good impulses and noble deeds of the nameless millions that have gone before us. They are the soul of our civilization, and that soul will be perfected and glorified by the sum of the good impulses and noble deeds of the countless millions that are to come. General Wallace's spirit is immortal in a double sense. He contributed much toward making life better, richer, and happier. His great influence was and is and always will be on the side of the good and the true. His life was a benediction, his death was a triumph. He did much to hasten the realization of the angel song to the humble shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem:

Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will toward men.

[Applause.]

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, it is a glorious privilege and a distinguished honor to stand in this Capitol, a representative of the people of this great Nation, and assist in the formal acceptance by our country of the statue donated by my home State of Indiana to perpetuate the conspicuous individuality of one of her most illustrious sons in the world-renowned Hall of Fame.

To those of us, his neighbors, who knew Gen. Lew Wallace and who have watched with unspeakable pride the growth of his fame to world-wide grandeur this memorial in perishable marble seems commonplace, for we know that the name of this celebrated soldier, diplomat, and author is written on the hearts of his countrymen, never to be effaced. And while it is said of him that he was great in war and profound in statecraft, the world would have had but passive peans of praise for him except for the beacon light he gave to mankind in his story of the Christ.

Others may eulogize his achievements as warrior and political strategist, but I want to cite to you the glories of his home life and the triumphs of his scholastic genius. General Wallace was born under favorable circumstances, and casually embraced his opportunities for culture. The son of one of Indiana's early governors, he traces his ancestry through distinguished Anglo-Saxon blood. His grandfather was a close personal friend of Gen. William Henry Harrison and his grandmother was a niece of the great sea captain, John Paul Jones. His father was a West Point graduate, a professor of mathematics in that splendid institution, and later a leading factor in public affairs of Indiana, having been its lieutenant-governor twice and its governor once. He was also a man of enthusiastic literary inclinations, being richly talented in book lore and an eloquent orator.

Being a student and scholar himself, Governor Wallace was ambitious to have his son Lew equipped with a classical education; but in this he achieved only a modest degree of accomplishment. When his father became governor, Lew Wallace was a lad of only ten summers. At this age Gustavus Adolphus had reached the council chamber, Horace Greeley was a student of the Bible and had read every paragraph of it, and Edward Everett Hale was a marvel in his familiarity with books. But, according to approved biography, at this age Lew Wallace had won no distinction, shown no inclination to become anything beyond a careless, dashing youth, with no apparent conception of the larger meaning of life. He loved a gun and to hunt and fish; and to exploit the perilous seemed his major bent. Could such a boy be resigned to student life? Not of the formal, methodical kind. But he loved good books, and his absence from school was frequently attributable to his having stolen away to some secluded spot to delve in the enchanting pages of a classic volume. See that boy stretched in the shade of a forest tree, his eyes fastened on the pages of a book, his gun lying at his side, and you behold a prophetic vision of a soldier-author of the future.

Being compelled to make his own way at 16 years of age, because he would not take the educational course prescribed by an ambitious father, young Wallace suddenly realized the stern necessities of life. He found employment as an office clerk and "made good." He increased his scope of knowledge by night study, and at the age of 19 he had read every book in his father's library—700 standard works. His school days had furnished him with but the rudiments of an education, and his clerical work taxed his energies, but his desire for knowledge was such that, to use his own words, "I persisted to such an extent that the dawn often stole through my window and found me over my books."

With this equipment of knowledge and inclination to participate in military offense and defense, Lew Wallace entered manhood's estate and gradually rose to general, lawyer, author, and diplomat. After heroic careers in the Mexican and civil wars, he resumed the practice of law at his home in Crawfordsville, Ind.; but his love of art and his literary propensity outstripped his professional zeal, and in 1873 he came into prominence as an author and sculptor, and his first book, The Fair God, was published. From this time on success favored this man of ultimate greatness, but it did not come without persevering exercise of rare will power. Speaking of his change from careless boyhood to a determination to make a success of life, General Wallace said to an admiring young friend who had called to learn of him:

I had to almost change my nature; all the loose habits had to be crushed out. A man can apply himself to anything if he has a certain fund of will. By a persevering effort he can discipline himself to a task which is in the beginning most laborious and disagreeable until it becomes a real pleasure. The secret of success is work! work! work! It takes work—

He repeated, pointing to a manuscript which had just been completed—

For instance, here are nine closely written pages which I have finished rewriting for the seventh time.

In 1878 General Wallace was made territorial governor of New Mexico, and in 1880, Ben Hur; A Tale of the Christ, appeared. The scene was laid in the East and displayed such a knowledge of the manners and customs of that country and people that General Garfield—that year elected President—considered its author a fitting person for the Turkish ministry, and accordingly, in 1881, he was appointed to that position. It is said that when President Garfield gave General Wallace his appointment he wrote the words "Ben Hur" across the corner of the document, and as Wallace was coming away from his visit of acknowledgment at the White House the President put his arm over his friend's shoulder and said:

I expect another book out of you. Your duties will not be too onerous to allow you to write it. Locate the scene in Constantinople.

This suggestion was, no doubt, General Wallace's reason for writing The Prince of India, which was published in 1890.

However, of all his literary work, in Ben Hur he reached the zenith of his fame, the triumph of his genius. Upon the windows of a publishing house in one of our great American cities, the passer-by may read the words: "Books are the only things that live forever." That is a noble sentiment, though but a partial truth. Books do live forever—that is, some books. And so do folks—that is, some folks. There is an earthly immortality. George Eliot writes of—

Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.

Thought is immortal. It can no more be buried than it can be burned or hanged. What better fame then, what more enduring monument can a man have than he has whose thoughts live after him, whose words are lifted up like banners to call humanity to worthier living? There is also a reflected immortality for the man who makes it his ministry on earth to search out the best thoughts of others and give them to the race.

And so Ben Hur reflects the aggressive concept, the dramatic splendor, and the sacred trend of Lew Wallace's life standard. In this, he gave color to his admiration for conquest in the "chariot race;" to his dramatic art in the thrilling triumph of the "galley slave;" and to his religious fervor in the "Prayer of the Wandering Jew," in which he graphically depicts the surrender of a soul in these words:

God of Israel—my God! These about me, my fellow-creatures, pray Thee in the hope of life. I pray Thee in the hope of death. I have come up from the sea, and the end was not there; now I will go into the desert in search of it. Or if I must live, Lord, give me the happiness there is in serving Thee.

Thou hast need of instruments of good; let me henceforth be one of them, that by working for Thy honor I may at last enjoy the peace of the blessed. Amen.

Perhaps no writer of modern times gained so wide a reputation on so few books or began his literary career so late in life as did the author of Ben Hur. Moreover, no other writer so suddenly leaped into such fame as to at once class him among the literati of the world, with such masters of wholesome fiction as William Dean Howells, James Fenimore Cooper, Edward Eggleston, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Edward Everett Hale, the typical novelists of America. He fixed his high rank in the galaxy of world-famed authors at a single show of talent, and his name is written there for all time.

So much for his wonderful accomplishments. But here, sirs, I ask you to turn with me to the supreme test of man's greatness—his home life. Some one has truly said that the place to take the true measure of a man is not the market place nor the amen corner, not the study nor the field, not the office nor the shop, but at his own fireside. [Applause.] There man lays aside his mask, and you may learn whether he is an imp or an angel, a king or a knave, a hero or a humbug. Care not what the world says of a man, whether it crown him with bays or pelt him with eggs; care never a copper what his reputation or religion may be; if his babes dread his home-coming and his wife swallows her heart every time she has to ask him for help, that man is a fraud, even though he prays night and morning until he is red in the face and shouts hallelujah until he shakes the eternal hills. [Applause.] But if children rush to open the front gate to meet him and love's own sunshine illumines the face of his wife when she hears his footsteps, he is true gold, for his home is a heaven, and the humbug never gets that near the great white throne.

General Wallace was not an amiable man in the popular conception of the term. His was a character of distinguished dignity in public, made so, no doubt, by his military training and his devotion to close friends and to books; and yet, to those who enjoyed the good fortune of intimate friendship with him, he was a most hospitable soul and interesting character. Not only did he read and write, but he was a musician and artist, and his collection of violins and his own paintings are among the most treasured legacies he left to his family.

And if you will indulge me a personal reference I will give you an insight into his gracious and generous heart, instances of his admiration of children and his concern for ambitious youth. Once when I called on him at his inviting home, where he spent most of his days either in the glow of his family fireside, in his quaint but imposing study, or 'neath the shade of the primeval beech trees of his six-odd acres of picturesque lawn, he left me to amuse myself while he entertained my two youthful descendants by spending so much time in showing them his collection of war and other curios, his books, his paintings, and so forth, that time of departure came and my share in the visit consisted only of a cordial greeting and a farewell salute.

Again, an ambitious Wabash College student of my intimate acquaintance, who had high ideals, sought out General Wallace at his home to learn of him in conjunction with his scholastic endeavor. He was not disappointed. The general at once welcomed him to use of his books, and spent hours with him in discussing the problems of the age and the philosophy of life. And by this mutual young friend I was given a word picture of General Wallace's home life that entitles him to greater honor than he ever achieved on field of battle or in the world of letters. It was a sketch of devotion and mutual inspiration of a loving and cultured wife and a great man. Mrs. Wallace was a woman of becoming dignity and rare intellectual gifts. Herself an author, it is known that she aided the general materially in his literary work. She was generous and kind, and directed many charities, quietly and unknown to the world, and gave much of her time and talent to glorifying the cause of her religion. He was constantly her companion and her comfort, and so the home life of these two was ideal. Alike in their tastes and with superior poise, their kindred souls became so much entwined that after the general's death his wife pined away in desolate loneliness for a few short months and then followed him joyously—beloved helpmeet in life, soul mate in death. [Applause.]

To the believer that environment shapes destiny the life of Wallace furnishes an impressive demonstration. Surrounded with classical books and official atmosphere in youth, blessed with the early and lasting companionship of a cultured and Christian wife, drilled in the school of military experience, favored with responsibility in the world court of diplomacy, and ever inspired by the wholesome habitation of a poetic home, Lew Wallace became great as a matter of course. His inviting fireside and his storehouse of knowledge furnished the sturdy foundation for culture, and the wide expanse of nature beauty and artistic handiwork about him inspired dramatic finish. His mind developed by practical endeavor and philosophic research, his heart content with home, sweet home, and his artistic tastes enriched by environ of gigantic beech forest trees, with their sweeping branches "festooning earth and sky," and his study touched with a quaint clear pool fed by a trout-stocked stream, what more could mortal need to lift him to loftiest realms of scholastic dreams? Did he tire of the study, he betook himself with tablet and pencil to an easy chair in the shade of a historic tree. Did he tire of writing, he stood on the balcony of his study with rod and reel and cast his baited hook to the shy trout or the game bass hiding in the moss-covered rocks below.

Such were the surroundings of the beautiful home life and the splendid career of him whom our country commemorates by this statue placed here among those of America's most illustrious sons. And yet it is said of him that, like all of us, he was not satisfied with his achievements. But such is life—yearning, yearning, yearning! Wealth does not satisfy, fame does not satisfy, literary attainment does not satisfy, travel does not satisfy, and home and family and friends do not satisfy. Nothing suffices for the heart's longing except the consolation furnished by the world's masterpiece of philosophy—the Book of Life, the inspiration of the ennobling narrative of Ben Hur; A Tale of the Christ.

May the memory of Lew Wallace, Indiana's illustrious author, outlive this durable cast as love survives mortality, and may the creative influence that gave the world such authorship and citizenship as his endure forever! [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, the historian will write in his book after a while that Lew Wallace is entitled to a place in history because he was a great author and a wise diplomat. He was a soldier, too, but his superiority as a military strategist was not so marked, because, possibly, he did not have the opportunity to show it.

Two elements enter prominently into every man's success—singleness of purpose and constancy of effort; a clear, rational, and intelligent selection of a purpose in life to be accomplished, one in harmony with your trend, one that appeals to your earnest efforts, and then that constant, unceasing, tireless task to realize your hopes and see the fruit of your ambition.

Every man, high or low, exalted or debased, living in the lap of luxury or in the poorest penury, has an ideal and seeks its inspiration. You like an ideal in every walk and profession of life, and you have always been touched with the fitful splendor of an ideal life, an ideal condition, and in proportion as your ideal is lofty and high so will you sacrifice largely to accomplish that ideal condition.

Carlyle said: "God makes a man and steps over centuries to make another." There is but one Homer, one Jesus Christ, one Shakespeare, one Washington, but he makes these evidences of His power to illustrate the possibilities of the race. [Applause.] In the knowledge of Homer, the absolutely perfect life of the Nazarene, in the marvelous conceptions of Shakespeare, in the statesmanship of Washington, the whole human race may find a high ideal. The whole trend of consciousness is toward that ideal condition. [Applause.]

Wallace was a threefold man—a diplomat, an author, and a soldier. So far as our diplomatic and consular service goes, we are in the infancy of what we may accomplish. The particular field of our diplomacy and consular service lies in establishing those friendly relations, socially and commercially, that the prominence of the United States as a world power commands.

For many years we penalized our foreign trade by vicious legislation. Our foreign commerce was a commercial piracy, snatching from the counters of the world's trade centers a little here and a little there and scurrying to cover under a high protective tariff law, and this continued to be so till that "Plumed Knight from Maine," than whom none greater ever rose in his party except the immortal Lincoln, learned the truth that Washington uttered in his farewell address, that our commerce could not grow except we were fair in our foreign relations. He declared that it was only through the doctrine of reciprocal trade relationship that we could permanently increase our foreign trade; that reciprocity would open to us the closed door for trade.

Wallace was sent to Turkey, a people whose name was a hiss-word and whose inhuman history was despised by the civilized world. But the tact and genius of that man, with a knowledge of our superiority in the world's affairs and of what we are yet to be, established a bond of friendship and respect for us through his official relationship that can not be broken. Through the influence of Wallace, and directly attributable to his influence as an official of the Government, we have increased our trade with Turkey in the last four years more than 100 per cent. Turkey learned from Wallace that the United States was her friend and sought to help her and her people, but, like a parent with a child, we would not suffer her to slay the innocent or commit crimes repugnant to an enlightened people without our reproof. More than once she has heeded our admonition.

As an author, the production of Ben Hur places Wallace in the class with Milton and Victor Hugo. The profundity of feeling, the sweep of his imagination, the comprehensive mental grasp exhibited in the story of the Christ gives it an ever-rising tide of moral worth. The influence of the age in which the story is laid, the environment, the stupendous event of the whole history of man unfolded, lent to him forces which only a Wallace could mold to his account in that marvelous production. What man may not be crowned as a successful man whose thoughts permeate the manners, customs, and lives of the under races of the world and shape them for the better, not for a day, but for ages to come. Into his diplomacy and the story of the Christ Wallace flung his whole life till they were finished. It is said of him that every waking hour was given to Ben Hur, so enraptured was he himself with his own story.

I turn to this splendid life of Wallace, to its inspiration, to its accomplishment of his purpose, to the brightness of his genius, to his strength and power, and behind all and above all is a force no human thought can know. It is only the exhibition of the life force we see, and not the life itself. Herbert Spencer sought to encompass the entire field of knowledge with the theory of evolution of forces, but after his failure he said:

> Life itself proves to be utterly inconceivable; there is probably an inconceivable element in its ultimate working. We do not see the power, only the manifestation of the power; the power itself is inconceivable.

The trend of consciousness is toward a perfect condition—toward a more complete life for every individual. In the whole economy of the universe this all-embracing purpose is made minifest. Our desire to perpetuate the memory of Wallace is the desire of the whole human race. We receive his marble statue in this Hall of Fame to attest our admiration of him and to project his character and work into the future. The millions that shall tread to and fro and look upon Lew Wallace will find in him the representation of the man who wrought one of the masterpieces of English literature. [Applause.]

A curious fact in this nature of ours: We admire the genius of Wallace, his deep feeling, his pathos and rise with him to the sublime heights that he rose, but he can not give to us for our keeping and enjoyment those generous powers he possessed. We, each for ourselves, if we desire to, must feel the thoughts he felt, be moved by the same impulses he was moved by, by our own individual effort.

In this closing hour of tribute there comes to us, as it always comes, unbidden, the most stupendous of all problems, that problem that makes the blood run slower in your veins and turns the soul back upon itself: Is there a Lew Wallace in all this vast universe to-day? And faith, not the child of despair, nor the heredity of ecclesiasticism, but an elementary constituent principle of our moral natures, turns to the everlasting eternal power for answer. Beyond the distant centuries it was written, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?" And since that inquiry man himself has responded that in all the vast creative genius of the Almighty he is the only creature that by his own power builds upon his own accomplishments higher and higher, till he reaches the very bosom of God himself. [Applause.] Assume that death is all! Let the stars go back into the black vault from which they came, if in their greeting there is no token of the breaking of an eternal morning; let the bursting rose of spring wither to ashes in the hand if in it there is no gospel of eternity; and let hope, the richest, dearest possession, die among the broken crags of a lifeless world!

> It must be so. Plato thou reasonest well:
> Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality?
> Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
> Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
> Back upon herself and startles at destruction?
> 'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
> 'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
> And intimates eternity to man.

[Applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, it was in 1864 Congress invited each State of the Union to erect statues of two of its most eminent citizens in the Old Hall of the House of Representatives. In pursuance of this invitation many of the States have accepted the privilege, Indiana being among the number. As you pass from one end of the Capitol to the other, you must, of necessity, go through Statuary Hall, and in passing through it you never fail to observe the large number of visitors charmed by the scene. Not only the statues, that attract, charm, and win the admiration of all who pause and think, but the memories that cluster around every object and bring fresh to the mind the memorable scenes in the history of that hall, all unite to constrain you to feel that you are in the presence of objects rendered sacred by their history.

Mr. Speaker, in selecting from among the illustrious dead of the State of Indiana the two most worthy to be represented in the Hall of Fame, it seemed to the general assembly of our beloved State appropriate, first of all, to choose the war governor, Oliver P. Morton, whose statue was presented to the Nation nine years ago; and, second, the scholar, patriot, lawyer, soldier, and author, Gen. Lew Wallace, whose statue now stands beside that of Morton.

It is both fitting and fortunate that these two statues should stand together. During the dark days of the sixties, when the black clouds of war hung heavy and thick over our Nation's capital, these two men were united in their effort to preserve the Union. Morton, as governor of Indiana, made a wise selection when he appointed Wallace adjutant-general; but Wallace was not contented in sending other men to the front, but asked to be relieved from the duties of adjutant-general, that he might go in the active service and fight for liberty, justice, and the preservation of the Union. And it was by reason of the service of such men as Wallace that the current of American patriotism was widened and deepened and the country saved from the peril that threatened her existence almost fifty years ago. Such patriotism infused a spirit into American citizenship that will guide and protect the American Union for centuries to come.

Gen. Lew Wallace was born at Brookville, Ind., April 10, 1827. He was, in every sense, a self-made man. He knew what it was to labor, and in this he was not different from his neighbors and associates, who, like himself, found the healthy and vigorous training by labor in early life the best preparation for the mental, as well as physical, tasks of after life. In his early life he never lost an opportunity to learn, as well as to labor, and although in those days the road to knowledge was rough and difficult, yet he acquired a good education and a command of language that enabled him to write a single book that made his name a household word the world over. At the beginning of the Mexican war he entered the army as a first lieutenant, and after having been honorably discharged from that service in 1848 he began the practice of law in Covington, Ind., but later moved his office to Crawfordsville, where he continued his practice. He was subsequently elected to the state senate and served four years in that body, with credit to himself and with credit to the people he represented. As I have stated, at the beginning of the civil war he was made adjutant-general of Indiana, but soon thereafter became colonel of the Eleventh Indiana Volunteer Infantry, with which he served in West Virginia, taking part in the capture of Romney and the ejection of the opposition at Harpers Ferry. On September 3, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and led a division of the Union lines at the capture of Fort Donelson. In this contest Wallace displayed such remarkable ability that on March 21, 1862, he was commissioned as major-general of Volunteers. He took an active part in the battle of Shiloh, his division having been placed on the north side of Snake Creek, on a road leading to Savannah or Crumps Landing to Purdy. He was ordered by General Grant to cross the creek and come up to Gen. W. T. Sherman's right, which covered the bridge over that stream, Sherman depending upon him for support, but on account of the almost impassable condition of the road he did not arrive until night. He was in time, however, to render efficient service in the second day's fight, and the subsequent days' advance on Corinth. It is to his credit to note that in November, 1862, he was president of the court of inquiry on military conduct of Don Carlos Buell in the operations in Tennessee and Kentucky. It was Wallace who prepared the defenses of Cincinnati in 1863, which he saved from capture and was subsequently assigned to the command of the Middle Department and the Eighth Army Corps, with headquarters in Baltimore, Md. With 5,800 men he intercepted the march of General Early on Washington, D. C., and on July 9, 1864, fought the battle of Monocacy, and although he was defeated he gained sufficient time to enable General Grant to send reenforcements to the Capitol from City Point.

General Wallace was in no way responsible for his defeat, but General Halleck, not at the time fully understanding the situation, issued an order removing him from his command, and Wallace was superceded by General Orde; but when General Grant learned all the particulars of the action he immediately reinstated Wallace. It will also be remembered that General Wallace was honored by being made the second member of the court that tried the assassins of President Lincoln, and was also made president of the court which tried and convicted Capt. Henry Wirz, commandant of Andersonville prison. He was mustered out of volunteer service in 1865, having given four years of his life in the service of his country. After having been mustered out of the volunteer service he returned to Crawfordsville, Ind., and again took up the practice of law. So far as I know, he won no particular distinction in the practice, but enjoyed and deserved the reputation of carefully and faithfully discharging every duty to his clients.

In 1878 he was made governor of New Mexico by President Hayes, and served in that capacity until 1881. It was during this service that he first conceived and wrote a part of Ben Hur, of which 300,000 copies have been printed and sold. It is no exaggeration to say that this was one of the most successful novels ever written, and has been read by millions of people the world over. It has been printed in many languages, and is without doubt the best story of Jesus ever written by mortal man. He also wrote the tale of The Fair God, being a story of the conquest of Mexico. This novel, however, was not so popular as Ben Hur, and the sale was somewhat limited. After his service as governor of New Mexico had ended, in 1881, he was appointed United States minister to Turkey by President Garfield and served in that capacity until 1885, when he returned to Crawfordsville and resumed the practice of law. General Wallace had been tendered other positions at foreign courts, but refused to accept them; but when offered the position as minister to Turkey he accepted and discharged the duties of that position in such manner as no other than a scholar, lawyer, soldier, and author could have done. With his rare ability, his courteous and graceful manner, he was splendidly equipped for the diplomatic service. In that position he won the admiration of the American people in his devotion to their interests and in the protection of their rights.

After his service had ended at a foreign court he returned to Crawfordsville and again resumed the practice of law. Lew Wallace was a man of such irreproachable integrity of character that all men who knew him were constrained to acknowledge his virtues. As a citizen he loved his country and her institutions and rejoiced in her progress and prosperity. As a soldier and author he ranked high, while as a debater and a lecturer he was exceptionally gifted. As a politician he never claimed to be a success, and as a legislator his experience was limited. While by voice and vote he contributed but little to the laws of our State, he always urged a strict observance of all the laws, both state and national. While he believed that bad laws, if any there were, should be repealed as speedily as possible, he also believed for the sake of example they should be sacredly observed while in force. He also believed, as did Lincoln, that every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity should swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country and never to encourage their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor—let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his fathers, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in the schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling-books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions sacrifice unceasingly upon its altar. While ever a state of feeling such as this shall universally or even very generally prevail throughout the nation, vain will be the effort and fruitless every attempt to subvert our national freedom. [Applause.]

While General Wallace earned and accumulated some wealth, he never allowed the almighty dollar to come between him and duty. It is unfortunate for the future welfare of our country that many of the American people place too high an estimate on riches. I have much admiration for the man who is industrious, economical, and provident, while I have no patience with the man who is reckless, indolent, and extravagant. We should remember the real purpose of earning money is to secure a happy and useful life, and not the sole end and aim of existence. The individual whose only purpose is to see how many dollars he can accumulate, how much of this world's goods he can gather together, is a detriment rather than a benefit to the Nation. Love, charity, and benevolence will be strangers to such an individual, and avarice, covetousness, and greed will be his companions. Unfortunately this mercenary spirit has grown in our country to such an extent that it is a reproach to our religion and a blot on our civilization. It is poisoning the life-blood of our Nation and marring the beauty of our free institutions with the ugly ulcers of official dishonesty. The effect of this mercenary spirit is detrimental to the welfare of our people and deserves the censure and condemnation of every true, loyal-hearted, patriotic American citizen. It is the duty of each one of us to do what we can toward crushing out selfishness and greed and inculculating a spirit of toleration, liberality, and charity, to the end that the people may not live for self alone, but for the good and happiness of all mankind. I am certain, Mr. Speaker, if Lew Wallace were living to-day, he would use his powerful intellect and his migty pen in striking down this grasping spirit which threatens the very foundation of our Government.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Indiana, among whom he was born, reared, and lived, and who are proud to mention his name, present to the Nation his image in enduring marble, and have placed it in "the sacred circle" among the immortal membership. We come now asking that it be accepted as the gift of Indiana, not claiming for him to have been the greatest of all, but only one of our citizens who was loved and trusted by our people, and who discharged his full duty as a citizen, as a soldier, as a patriot, and as a statesman. I ask that you accept our gift and express the hope for the prosperity, the happiness, and the continuance of the great American Union, "one and inseparable, now and forever." [Applause.]

Mr. DIXON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, to-day this House turns from the routine order of business for a time to accept from the State of Indiana a statue of one of her most illustrious and distinguished sons, Lew Wallace.

This tribute she thus bestows upon her honored dead is in recognition of his services to his State, his country, and to mankind as soldier, diplomat, and author. As a soldier he was faithful and brave, and his services honored his State; as a diplomat he gave character and standing abroad to his country, and as an author he brought the life of the Nazarene nearer to the hearts of all mankind. Indiana thus honors Wallace dead, for Wallace living added to the fame and glory of that State.

In 1864, after the completion of the present Hall of the House of Representatives, a law was enacted which provided in substance that each and all the States be invited to provide and furnish statues, not exceeding two in number, of deceased persons who had been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military service, and when so furnished should be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, which was set apart as a National Statuary Hall.

It was a beautiful conception of Senator Morrill, of Vermont, that led to the dedication of that Chamber as a Statuary Hall, wherein should be placed the marble and bronze figures of so many renowned and distinguished heroes. That old Hall was the scene of many contests, in which the Nation's greatest leaders had engaged. It had been hallowed by their presence, and fitting, indeed, that it should become the place where the country's history could be read in the silent figures gathered there. It typifies our loyalty to the past, strengthens us in our devotion to the country, and will be an inspiration to those yet unborn who will linger in that silent chamber of the dead.

Within that Hall are found eminent soldiers, citizens, and statesmen, whose names are not only familiar to all, but whose services have added luster and renown to our country. They represent the soldiers whose bravery and daring in the Revolutionary war gave us a free Government; those who carried our banners in triumph in the war with Mexico, and those who led our forces in the civil war and carried our banners, in defeat and victory, from Manassas to Appomattox, but always with bravery and devotion and to ultimate success; statesmen whose learning and wisdom builded the great fabric of our civil government, that has stood the assaults of more than a century and has become an inspiration and a hope for the struggling and oppressed of other lands; statesmen whose diplomacy has secured an extension of our territory from the 13 original States until it encompasses the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific—a territory of untold wealth; statesmen who followed the noble example of the magnanimous Grant at Appomattox, and cemented the union of States and of hearts which found its happiest realization in the Spanish war, where sons of grandfathers who had marched shoulder to shoulder in the Revolutionary war and had rejoiced together at the surrender of Burgoyne; sons of fathers who had met in the many battles of the civil war and had rendered famous the battlefields of Shiloh, Chickamauga, and Gettysburg; and in Cuba marched side by side up San Juan Hill and displayed the same courage that had made their fathers famous in the battlefields of the civil war and their forefathers illustrious by their victories in the war for independence.

The legislature of Indiana had a delicate task to perform in selecting the persons whom she would honor by presenting their statues to the Government. Indiana had a galaxy of distinguished, patriotic, and heroic sons from whom to choose. There sleep within her beloved borders many men who had no peers as statesmen, no superiors as scholars and authors, and none who displayed greater courage or bravery on the battlefield, any one of whom Indiana would proudly honor. She has produced statesmen whose learning and patriotism have given strength and power to the Nation; scholars whose learning has called them to the highest educational institutions in the land; orators whose words have enraptured and thrilled the multitudes; poets whose sweet songs have enthralled the continent; authors whose writings have illuminated the literature of the world; and soldiers whose bravery and devotion on every battlefield have added grandeur and glory to our country. To-day she has a high and intellectual citizenship of noble and honest people, the highest type of civilization, the choicest and the brightest gem of all her possessions.

Indiana could have selected with pride Benjamin Harrison, a former President and a statesman in the highest and the broadest sense of the word; Thomas A. Hendricks, the gifted and patriotic governor, Senator, and Vice-President, who graced, dignified, and honored every official position he ever occupied [applause]; David Turpie, the intellectual giant and most scholarly gentleman who ever graced and adorned the Senate Chamber; Daniel W. Voorhees, the brilliant orator and friend of all mankind, whose warm heart beat in sympathy with the oppressed of every land [applause]; or Joseph E. McDonald, whose legal mind had no superior. These men would each be worthy associates of the immortals in this Pantheon of the Nation.

On April 14, 1900, this House accepted the first statue contributed by the State of Indiana, that of Oliver P. Morton. It was a fitting gift from the State he loved and served so faithfully and well. To-day, the second statue from our State—the first man whom Morton called for consultation and advice after Sumter had been fired on.

Lew Wallace was born in Brookville, Franklin County, Ind., on April 10, 1827, and remained a citizen of Indiana until his death, February 15, 1905.

Lew Wallace was not a student as a boy and gave no early premonitions of his future success. As a schoolboy of 6 he witnessed the departure of the volunteers for the Black Hawk war; plaudits of the crowd thrilled him with pleasure, the military display captivated his mind, and he imbibed a love for a soldier's life.

He attended college and later reported the proceedings of the legislature for one of the city papers. During this time he gave great attention to literary reading and conceived the idea of writing a book that ultimately developed into The Fair God. With such taste his failure to secure a license to practice law is not surprising. Blackstone, Chitty, and Kent were not especially interesting to him whose thoughts and ideas were on other things.

It was at this time that General Taylor had departed on an unknown mission to Mexico, and war with that country was regarded as a probability. Wallace was more interested in reading the account of threatened war than in reading law, and promptly at the beginning of that war he opened a recruiting station and raised a company of volunteers, was elected an officer thereof, and went to Mexico. A soldier for a year, he was never in a battle nor heard the roar of contending armies, but was ready at all times to respond to orders and perform a soldier's duty. His military life ended, he began the practice of law. He was elected prosecuting attorney for two terms, and in 1856 he became state senator. A few years before, he was reporting the speeches of others; he had now returned to become a participant himself. Wallace was a Democrat at that time, and every office he ever held by election was received from that party.

As a member of the Senate he introduced a resolution favoring the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, in harmony with the sentiments then and now of that party. In the fierce political contests in the legislature, when the fight seemed to threaten the party, he never flinched, but obeyed the command of the caucus, though its decrees were not always in accordance with his judgment.

Morton and Wallace had been political friends and associates, both Democrats, and when Morton espoused the cause of the new Republican party they became estranged. When the signs pointed to war in 1861 Wallace called upon Morton, then governor, and tendered his services in case war became inevitable. The coldness between them melted away in the presence of threatened danger to the Nation, and they became united in purpose for the preservation of the Union. On April 13, 1861, Wallace was addressing a jury when a telegram was placed in his hands; a message short, yet momentous in its results. It read, "Sumter has been fired on; come immediately," and was signed by Oliver P. Morton. The speech was left unfinished, and Wallace reported for duty.

Hardly had the electric wire flashed the message over the borders of Indiana than thousands of her sons shouted their willingness to uphold the flag. Wallace reported for duty Sunday night and was appointed to raise the troops in response to the President's call. Within five days 130 companies were in camp, more than double the number requested. Wallace was appointed colonel, and marched from Indiana with the Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers. From that day to the end of the war he gave his thoughts, his services, and his heart to the Union cause. He won rank and distinction; entering the army as colonel, he left it as major-general. His services in the field were supplemented by his counsel at headquarters. A disciplinarian, yet always considerate of the private soldier. He knew that victories were won by private soldiers whose names were merged in the general result of battles and only the officers' names remembered. Hope of military renown and the voice of ambition were not in his thought; he responded to his country's call and faithfully performed a soldier's duty. On every battlefield where he was present he was in the foremost of the fight, and his presence both cheered and encouraged his brave troops. The Shiloh episode for a time dimmed the luster of his military fame; but "Truth crushed to earth will rise again," and those who were first to censure later were generous enough to confess their original error. The loyalty of his men gave added evidence of the injustice of the charge. This alleged misconduct dimmed for a period his military prestige and relieved him of active duty in the field. Later Wallace was placed in charge at Baltimore.

He saw the confederate forces under General Early massing for action and believed the objective point was Washington. With speed, energy, and tact he gathered his small forces in the path of the 30,000 marching on Washington. Victory was impossible, success inconceivable, but to delay the enemy's march a day meant Washington saved. With courage that was matchless, with heroism that was sublime, he blocked the progress of the confederate troops until Grant could reenforce Washington. General Grant gave Wallace alone the credit of saving Washington, and Wallace was recognized as the hero of Monocacy. In that great conflict Indiana did her full duty. One-half of her citizens eligible by age for military service went to the field. No State did more.

Wallace left the army at the close of the war and returned to the pursuits of peace. The war over, he taught the lessons of forgiveness and sought to bind up the wounds of the broken South. He believed a cessation of war should be followed by reunion and reconciliation, and that—

> You can not chain the eagle,
> You will not harm the dove,
> And many a gate which hath bars to hate
> Will open wide to love.

[Applause.]

In 1873 he published The Fair God, which established in the country his literary genius. Ben Hur, the crowning glory of his life, was given to the world in 1878.

The world has placed a high estimate upon the literary works of Wallace. Ben Hur has been dramatized, and this has added to the publicity and value of the work. It has been translated into French, Bohemian, Swedish, Turkish, Spanish, Portuguese, and Arabic, and printed in raised letters for the blind. Few books receive such prominence and few deserve the same. His stories are not only interesting and entertaining, but they are thrilling and instructive. His style is pleasing and inimitable; his word painting, beautiful and fascinating. The account of the chariot race is so natural that it is thrilling as well as vivid and realistic. The sea fight is intensely dramatic and wonderful, and the disentombing of Ben Hur's mother and sister and their midnight visit to their old home at Jerusalem holds one entranced.

The religious belief of Wallace has been a subject of discussion by those whose only knowledge of him was from his works. In his autobiography he says:

> In the very beginning, before distractions overtake me, I wish to say that I believe absolutely in the Christian conception of God. As far as it goes this confession is broad and unqualified, and it ought and would be sufficient were it not that books of mine, Ben Hur and The Prince of India, have led many persons to speculate concerning my creed. I am not a member of any church or denomination, nor have I ever been. Not that churches are objectionable to me, but simply because my freedom is enjoyable, and I do not think myself good enough to be a communicant. None the less, I believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ, and that there may be no suspicion of haggling on the word "divinity" permission is besought to quote the preface of a little volume of mine, The Boyhood of Christ.

Should anyone ask of another or wonder in himself why I, who am neither minister of the gospel, theologian, nor churchman, have presumed to write this book, it pleases me to answer him, respectfully, I wrote it to fix an impression distinctly in my mind. Asks he for the impression thus sought to be fixed in my mind, then I would be twice happy did he content himself with this answer: The Jesus Christ, in whom I believe, was, in all the stages of His life, a human being. His divinity was the Spirit within Him, "And the Spirit was God."

General Wallace was governor of New Mexico and minister to Turkey. He believed that with a change in the political administration of the Government the President should be relieved of the services of those of opposite politics. Upon the day Cleveland was inaugurated he telegraphed his resignation as minister to Turkey. On the preceding day, in a letter to his wife, he said:

I have tried many things in the course of the drama, the law, soldiery, politics, authorship, and last, diplomacy; and if I pass judgment upon the success achieved in each, it seems now that when I sit down finally in the old man's gown and slippers, helping the cat to keep the fireplace warm, I shall look back upon Ben Hur as my best performance and this mission near the Sultan as my next best.

Wallace was a man of great ability and spotless character, and had a most memorable, most remarkable, and most successful career. Obedience to duty was the rule of his life; he obeyed his superior and expected obedience from his subordinates. Devoted to the soldiers of his division, they in turn were loyal in their devotion to him. He was happiest when adding to the pleasures of others, and believed a life of duty was the only pathway to the heights of true greatness.

In the life of Wallace can be seen the relative reward of politics and authorship. Political position may dazzle the mind for a time and becloud the judgment; its honors may appear alluring and priceless, but they are unstable, uncertain, and transitory. But authorship will survive the cataclysm of politics. Wallace's father was governor, but only the political student remembers that fact; the author of Ben Hur will be known in the centuries yet unborn.

Mr. Speaker, Indiana has no ordinary place in her relations to other States; with less than a hundred thousand when admitted into the Union, she now has nearly three million citizens. Her broad plains, her inexhaustible mines of hidden wealth, her fertile valleys and beautiful rivers, have made her an enviable name. Her institutions of learning dot her broad surface as the stars bedeck the illimitable blue, her houses of religious worship, lifting heavenward their countless spires, join in the enchanting chorus of her material prosperity, intellectual development, and moral elevation.

In engineering she gave to the world James Buchanan Eads; in painting, Steele, Stark, and Forsythe, whose works delight the eye and charm the beholder; in sculpture, Mahoney and Bernard, whose works adorn and beautify the parks and public buildings of the country; in diplomacy, Hay and Foster, Denby and Wallace, and each has graced the international politics of the world; in statesmanship, Hendricks and Morton, McDonald and Harrison, Kerr and Colfax, Lane and Julian, Thompson and Voorhees, Turpie and Gresham. "She has furnished illustrious names to other States, Harding to Utah, Blaisdell to Nevada, Lane to Oregon, Burnside to Rhode Island, Wright to Iowa, and Spooner to Wisconsin." In literature she has given to the world Edward Eggleston, Maurice Thompson, Meredith Nicholson, Booth Tarkington, Charles Major, George Ade, and James Whitcomb Riley. She has furnished a President, three Vice-Presidents, and three Speakers of the National House of Representatives, whose services are interwoven with the Nation's history.

In Indiana there lived for many years a youth who gained there his early education and whose character was molded by its environments, a youth who in later years became the idol of our Nation, the tenderest, most loving, and most loved of all our leaders—the martyred Lincoln. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we as Indianians are proud of our beloved State, proud of its history, proud of its people and its high standard of citizenship, proud of their devotion to the State and Nation, proud of the intellectual and social position of its inhabitants, proud of its physical character as one of her own gifted women has so truthfully said:

The winds of Heaven never fanned,
The circling sunlight never spanned,
A fairer or a better land
Than our own Indiana.

[Applause.]

Proud as we are of all this, we are prouder yet to be citizens of the mighty Republic in which are wrapped the hopes and aspirations of all mankind—a nation destined to be the controlling factor in the progress of the world.

Now Indiana places by the side of Morton the image of Wallace and salutes him as a soldier, diplomat, and author. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, it seems especially fitting that in these exercises I should express a tribute to the memory of the man whose statue we to-day accept and place in Memorial Hall, because I am an Indianian and share with my people a just pride in her great men, and for the further reason that Gen. Lew Wallace was born in the congressional district I have the honor to represent in this body.

The old town of Brookville, situated in one of the most picturesque and beautiful portions of the country and made historic by reason of having located in it the land office through which entry was made to the lands in the new country and by reason of furnishing to the country many men who distinguished themselves in the various walks of life, was his birthplace.

When less than 5 years old he removed with his family to Covington, Ind., on the banks of the Wabash, and before reaching the age when he was placed in school became the almost daily companion of the ferryman who plied his boat across the river at that point, sharing with him his noonday meal, and by this association no doubt learning lessons which were to be a strength to him in his life work.

In his school days he was a normal boy, for while attending a seminary he says of himself:

The river was a siren, with a song everlasting in my ears. I could hear it the day long. It seemed especially addressed to me, and was at no time so sweet and irresistible as when I was struggling with the multiplication table or some abstruse rule of grammar.

We get an insight into the character of mind it took to produce the books he wrote when we learn that he had no taste for mathematics and made up his mind when he first saw an arithmetic that the science of numbers and himself would never be friends, which he says proved to be true through all his life, and when we learn the further fact that geography appealed to him and strengthened his imagination. From its pages he learned that there were other rivers than the Wabash, and that beyond the great oceans there were countries peopled as was his own neighborhood.

If programmes made out for the youth by teachers had have been always strictly enforced, many of the world's greatest orations would have remained unspoken, and poetry and song that is worth while would not have been written.

He seemed from his youth to be destined for a soldier, for while in school he spent much time in the drawing of imaginary battlefields and placing contending armies thereon.

While yet a very young man he became a soldier for his country in the Mexican war, and his gallantry and zeal won for him the approval of his people and distinguished him as one possessed of military genius of a high order.

As adjutant-general of Indiana under the great war governor, Oliver P. Morton, he bore a conspicuous part in the work of raising and equipping Indiana's first soldiers in the war of the rebellion, and finally, at his earnest solicitation, the military spirit within him having taken complete possession, he was permitted by the governor to leave his post and go to the front, and during the years from 1861 to 1865 in that great conflict he bore such a part as to make for himself a name as a soldier that shall last so long as there is history.

The thing that brings him nearer to the hearts of the people of to-day than any of his achievements was the writing of Ben Hur, a book that has been translated into every modern tongue and read by more people than any book, save two, that has ever been penned by man.

Various reasons have been assigned by different persons, some of which have been claimed by the authors to have been obtained from him, for his writing this book, but I believe that what appealed to his soul and took possession of him and was the starting point from which the story was evolved was the following from Matthew's gospel:

Now, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem saying, Where is He that is born King of the Jews, for we have seen His star in the east and have come to worship Him.

He saw and touched hands and lived with the characters of this great book as he himself expressed it. He rode with Balthasar on his great white camel to the place appointed for the meeting beyond Moab. He traveled with the mysterious three wise men on their several journeys to their place of meeting, and was present and listened to their introductions and explanations of how each was summoned by the spirit to come. He sat down and ate with them in the shade of their tent and journeyed with them to Jerusalem, guided by the star. He lay with the shepherds in their sheepfold on that first Christmas night. He saw the serene and beautiful face of Mary. He worked as a galley slave and drove the wonderful and beautiful horses in the chariot race.

When Dickens wrote Nicholas Nickleby he awakened the conscience of the English people and aroused them against the existing school system, and thus did more for the children of that country than could have been accomplished in a long time by the teaching of the philosophers, and through the pages of Ben Hur Wallace struck infidelity a harder blow than had been dealt it by the preaching of years.

He believed that a government such as ours would live and be perpetuated only through opposing political parties, and having this belief he was a loyal and ardent member of that political party he thought best able to administer the affairs of the people, but he was so mindful of the rights of those who differed from him as to their opinions that he carried his partisanship without giving offense.

He was a leader of men, who sought and procured a following by no other means than the force of his character and abilities as an orator and writer. A man of convictions and courage, who indulged them without bitterness or hate.

The speeches and writings of the statesmen whose statues grace this Hall may be read less and less as generations succeed each other, but as long as the story of the life and mission of Jesus is read and believed, so long will the story of Ben Hur be read and appeal to the hearts of the people, and in years to come more will look upon the statue of General Wallace and feel that they have an acquaintance with the character of the man whom it represents than almost any other placed about it. [Applause.]

He discharged the duties of every public trust honestly, faithfully, and with full measure.

We present this monument to the Nation as a tribute to him as soldier, diplomat, and author, and in the hearts of the people who knew him best he is enshrined as a gallant soldier, a matchless diplomat, a great author, and, above all, an ideal citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Lew Wallace was born at Brookville, Ind., in April, 1827, and died at Crawfordsville, in his native State, in February, 1905.

His life covered a span of seventy-eight years, considerably more than the allotted three score and ten. His birth occurred just eleven years after Indiana had been admitted into the Union as a State and when it contained a population of less than 150,000 people in all of its territory of more than 35,000 square miles. Its broad, unbroken prairies and giant forests, with but few exceptions, were as they had come from the hand of nature, and the painted and plumed barbarian still made his habitation within its boundaries; settlements were few and distances between them great.

There was not at that time a single mile of railroad, telegraph, or telephone in the entire State or a city with a population of as much as 10,000. Its great mines and quarries were undiscovered, and its vast reservoirs of gas and oil were unknown. Its great manufactories now operated were not even within the dream of the most optimistic.

How marvelous the progress which marked the period embraced in his lifetime! At the time of his death the State contained a population of nearly 3,000,000; its territory checked and interlaced with steam and electric roads, telegraph and telephone lines, dotted with splendid cities, and the whole territory in a high state of cultivation, yielding more of the cereals according to its size than any other State in the Union; with its inexhaustible mines and quarries producing enormous wealth and its mineral wells pouring out their great quantities of gas and oil, multiplying the wealth and supplying comfort and happiness for its people; its great manufactories scattered over every part of the State, employing thousands and producing almost every article of mechanics which the genius of man has been able to invent or devise.

The transition was most wonderful and is hard to realize, but it occurred under his observation as he worked out the problem of a noble life. It has been said that one of the greatest blessings than can fall to the lot of man is "to be born well, live well, and die well." It can be truthfully said that he enjoyed all these, and the legacy he left to his posterity embraces this noble distinction. His father was a public man of high renown, a Member of the Congress of the United States, and an honored governor of the State of Indiana, a man of ability, sterling character, and endowed with fine intellectual qualities. His mother was a woman of great culture, noble mind, and rare womanly graces. Reared amid such splendid environments and such good influences impressed upon his mind in youth and early manhood shaped and fashioned his character for the useful career and splendid life of his mature manhood and the great achievements carved out for him when life's battles had ended he had truly won great victories as a reward.

He lived not only in a period of great material and mental progress, but also in a period when surrounded in every department of life with great and noted intellectual characters. He had for contemporaries in his own State men of great mental powers, with whom to earn distinction he must measure arms and do battle. Fearlessly he entered the arena and withstood the contest and carried off honors which gave him an enviable position among the illustrious men of the world.

Among his associates in Indiana were such distinguished men as Thomas A. Hendricks, Benjamin Harrison, Richard W. Thompson, Oliver P. Morton, Daniel W. Voorhees, Joseph E. McDonald, and David Turpie, each of whom arose to high positions in the eyes of their countrymen and left undying fame as a legacy for their great State. These men and others were rivals with him before the public for favors and preferment at the same time, and all of them earned a reward worthy of a place in the great "Hall of Fame" as a distinction for work well done and conspicuous public service.

Their great services and wonderful achievements in statesmanship successfully challenge the history of any other State in the American Union to produce such a galaxy of names living at the same period of time. As a statesman, President, and constitutional lawyer, Benjamin Harrison is without a peer; Thomas A. Hendricks as a Vice-President, governor, Senator, and statesman has no superior; Oliver P. Morton as governor and Senator was celebrated for his executive ability and great leadership; Daniel W. Voorhees was the greatest orator of his day, either at the bar or on the hustings; Joseph E. McDonald was a great lawyer, organizer, and a fearless leader; Richard W. Thompson as a Cabinet officer was a diplomat of great distinction; David Turpie was a man celebrated for his rare scholarly attainments. With such renowned men as these Lew Wallace had to compete and won his way to fame.

He selected the law as a vocation in life, and made reasonable progress fighting his way among such distinguished and powerful associates. When the civil war broke out he was in the prime of manhood and earning in his chosen profession a splendid reputation, commanding the confidence of bench and bar by his sterling qualities of head and heart and manly conduct.

In the spring of 1861, while trying a lawsuit at Frankfort, Ind., during the course of his argument to the jury, he was interrupted and handed a telegram from Governor Morton, requesting his immediate presence at Indianapolis for a conference and advising him that the flag had been fired on at Fort Sumter. He turned from the jury and handed the message to the judge on the bench, and at once, without concluding his argument, left the court room, mounted a horse, rode miles to the nearest railroad station, and took the first train for Indianapolis. Arriving there, he immediately sought the governor, learned of the national situation, the impending danger, and then and there tendered his services to his country, which were accepted, and he at once raised a regiment and marched to the front in defense of his country.

As the colonel of his regiment when mustered in, he required each man on bended knees and with uplifted hand to pledge his honor as a sacrifice to unfaltering bravery, either in or out of battle, as long as he remained in the service. At this time excitement ran high and public sentiment was at fever heat. The State was stirred to patriotic duty from the Ohio state line on the east to the Wabash River on the west and from the Ohio River on the south to Lake Michigan on the north.

Indiana at that time had a population of about 800,000, and yet it furnished for the federal army 250,000 soldiers, a record of which few States can boast, a record that made it famous throughout the Union.

Lew Wallace, on account of bravery and military skill, was promoted to a generalship, and as a skillful commander was often commended, as a reward of high merit. When the war closed and peace was declared he returned to the civic walks of life and took up his chosen profession, and aided in binding up the wounds of the Nation, healing its sores, and reestablishing the marvelous prosperity which has marked its onward march since the sisterhood of States was restored. But he had become conspicuous in the public eye, and he was soon afterwards called to be a territorial governor and a foreign diplomat as the reward of his well-trained mind and splendid conception of public duty.

In every public position he elevated the public service by his faithful and able discharge of its duties, so that whether in civil or military office he left an impression for good accomplished in the work performed. He made a commendable record, he elevated the public office to a position of public trust, and established higher standards as precepts for others to follow and imitate. But it was not in military or official life where he won greatest honors. If rested on these alone, his fame would be secure and legacy rich. But his greatest triumphs were in the literary fields, where he earned honor greater than all else, and which has made his name a household word throughout the literary world, and where it will remain as long as the Anglo-Saxon civilization exists.

Fair God, Ben Hur, and The Prince of India are the products of his brain, displaying his rare genius and power, the great resources of his well-trained intellect. These contributions to the literature of the world are worthy of the pen of the writers of any age and have heralded the fame of their author to the limits of civilization and will continue to do so for ages, and will instruct, amuse, and entertain generations yet unborn. [Applause.]

In the evolution of time, with its unfolding mysteries, these works, the products of his pen, will hold a place secure in the public affection as works worthy of the libraries of the most fastidious, as companions for the student and delight for the public. In them is displayed the real genius of the man, the magnitude of his ability, and the high order of his well-trained mind. The moral each unfolds and impresses as the lesson taught elevates the thought and inspires higher and better ideals in all who read and study these great productions.

In these are revealed the real character of the man and the noble purposes to which he dedicated his life work—that from his soul he loved the good above all else as the highest and best purpose to which his powers could be devoted in pointing out the object of man's creation. He left by this employment of his great genius a heritage to posterity which will bear lasting fruits in the betterment of his race and the elevation of conditions throughout the world, contributing to the supremacy of mental power over physical force and the triumph of reason in the struggle which ensues among the millions of humanity for power and domination in the tempestuous course of life.

As days crowd days into weeks, weeks into months, and months into years, the value of his well-spent life and devoted efforts will increase in public appreciation, and his services will yield greater influence in the measure of human greatness. Around his memory will be woven garlands of great richness as evidence of the growing esteem the world has for the memory of one who carved on the temple of undying fame the work of a great and useful life, devoted to the elevation of his race and to the inspiration of life eternal. It is fitting that the State of his birth, the scene of his entire life, the theater of his action, should place a statue in the great Hall of Fame as a mark of distinction, as an evidence of recognition of the great services he rendered, and as an approval by his State for the honor and glory he left it as an enduring heritage, crowned by his countrymen with laurels, lauded and envied by his rivals in the struggling march of humanity throughout the countless ages as measured on the calendar of time, he will sleep in the soil of his native State waiting the verdict of eternity oblivious to what we say or do here.

As future generations will march through the Hall of Fame in this the Capitol of the greatest Nation in the world, they will pause and look upon the marble figure representing Gen. Lew Wallace, soldier, diplomat, and author, an honored son of the great Republic, it will inspire them to higher purposes, greater zeal, and loftier ideals in life's work, and it will increase their devotion to the institutions of their country and impress upon them the reward the fulfillment of good citizenship will receive, and that a human life well spent for the uplift of humanity has its lasting compensation which a generous public will bestow in commemoration as a reward. [Applause.]

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress and a citizen of the State that gave to our country Lew Wallace, it is my pleasure, and I deem it my duty, to say something on this occasion in commemoration of that great man and to call attention to what I regard as being the most important feature of his work.

In the work of most men some particular part stands out preeminent. This is true of Wallace. Ben Hur is the crowning glory of his accomplishments. As a boy, the work made a profound impression on me; with advancing years, it has become one of my treasures. Its great strength lies not in its pure diction, wonderful style, or tender pathos, but in its purpose. Before writing this book Wallace was a man indifferent in feeling respecting the "to-morrow of death" of the "succession of life." No doubt this was an unsatisfactory state of mind. Without any formulated ideas as to his conclusion, he took for a key to the subject of his tale the quotation from St. Matthew:

> Now, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying: Where is He that is born King of the Jews? For we have seen His star in the east and are come to worship Him.

In speaking of his work, after commenting on his lack of convictions about God or Christ, Wallace says: "Long before I was through with my book I became a believer in God and Christ." As the Egyptian, the Hindoo, and the Greek are irresistibly drawn to their meeting place in the desert, so is the author drawn to his conclusions. The purpose is thus clearly disclosed. And therein lies the secret of the great success of the work. As the character of Hur grows in the book the conviction has grown in the author. So far as the belief of Ben Hur went, it was very much like that of Wallace. He wrote reverentially and sometimes with awe.

The only time that Jesus Christ is present as an actor in a scene created by Wallace is when He gives the cup of water to Ben Hur at the well near Nazareth. Afterwards, when Ben Hur listened to the preaching of the Nazarene, gazing upon his wonderful countenance, he remembers having seen the man.

> The look so calm, so pitiful, so loving, had somewhere in the past beamed upon him as that moment it was beaming on Balthazar became an assurance. Faintly at first, at last a clear light, a burst of sunshine, the scene by the well at Nazareth what time the Roman guard was dragging him to the galleys returned, and all his being thrilled.

The wise men saw by the light of inspiration and believed. Ben Hur did not. In undertaking to convince Ben Hur the author convinces himself. That same conviction gradually steals over the reader. The work of Wallace as a soldier and a diplomat made him one of the benefactors of his country; Ben Hur one of the benefactors of the Christian world.

The American who in the future visits the Capitol of our country and stands in the presence of the figures which adorn Statuary Hall will think of Wallace as the author of Ben Hur. They will feel again the thrill of the chariot race. Their pity will again be excited by the misfortunes of the family of Hur, their indignation aroused by the cruelty of the Romans, and they will again be moved to religious emotion and persuaded to religious belief by his portrayal of the life and death of the lowly Nazarene. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, during the ceremonies at the unveiling of his statue in Statuary Hall, and during the proceedings had in the United States Senate and thus far in the House by way of formal acceptance thereof by the Congress, high tribute has been paid to Gen. Lew Wallace as scholar, soldier, diplomat, author, and citizen.

No word of mine can add in the slightest degree to the just, but appreciative and affectionate, characterization of this great man, as the same has already been set forth in poetry and prose by men who were intimately acquainted with his life and labors.

General Wallace was a true soldier. He was skilled and efficient in military organization. He was a wise and valiant commander of his men. One who served under him and learned on the field of battle to obey, admire, and love General Wallace has borne cheerful testimony to these elements of his many-sided character. The fittest tribute to our soldier dead falls naturally from the lips of a living soldier, his comrade in arms, his faithful officer of inferior rank.

The best loved of living American poets has cast the deathless character of General Wallace into the changeless form of classic verse. The chief executive of the State he loved and its representatives in the Senate of the United States have given to the world, and left upon the records of the Congress, full and fair estimates of General Wallace as scholar, soldier, diplomat, author, and as an ideal citizen of Indiana and of the Republic. To these the Members of this House have craved permission to add such words as shall in some fair measure give expression to the deep and deathless admiration and gratitude of the men and women whom they represent.

We, who were his neighbors, are permitted to pass and repass the almost enchanted spot where he wrote his immortal Ben Hur, a spot that grows dearer and more attractive with the passing years. To us, as to all the world, General Wallace is, and shall ever be, a scholar, soldier, and statesman. But I fancy that by us he shall, in an ever-increasing measure, be remembered as the ideal citizen of Crawfordsville and the author of Ben Hur.

Men give character to the communities in which they live. Communities give character to men. Men and communities mutually mold, fashion, beautify, and adorn each other. It was a fact of no small import that the life of this splendid man was lived in the "Athens of the West." Learning and high character had given to his city a distinctive name known of all men throughout the Republic. He dwelt amidst its classic influences and was part of its refinement and culture. His character and works were, in part, inspired and ennobled by the community in which he lived. Upon the city of Crawfordsville and far beyond its confines the influence and memory of his personality and daily life shall long rest as an abiding benediction, pleading "like angels, trumpet-tongued," against all that is little and mean and selfish in men's lives.

He has taken his place among the immortals. He has realized the highest of all the hopes of men. I know of no hope that is sweeter to the human heart than the hope of immortality. I know of no assurance more blessed to one, in sickness or in health, than the assurance that, when one is called out of the activities of this life, he shall yet live. So, indeed, the true man shall. He shall live in his own good works. He shall live in the memory of his friends and in the hearts of those whom he loved and by whom he was loved. He shall live in the Father's house, in the City Beautiful beyond the stars. This is immortality, indeed, a triple immortality, the rich reward and fruitage of a good man's life.

His earthly immortality is of no common type. The greatest of the products of his brain and heart takes deeper hold upon the hearts and minds of men year after year and shall generation after generation. The translator has added his contribution to the work of the author. In every civilized nation on the globe men are reading the thoughts of Lew Wallace in their own mother tongue. The prophecy of Pentecost is finding a partial fulfillment in the ever deepening and widening influence of our hero's masterpiece.

For the sake of the fair renown of our beloved dead, for the spread of the kingdom of our common Master, and for the highest good of human kind, let it be our fond hope and fervent prayer that in every age, in every land, and in every tongue men shall read more and more the inimitable and imperishable drama of Ben Hur, a tale of the Christ.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print remarks on the pending resolution be granted for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that general leave to print remarks for five legislative days on the pending resolution be granted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I move now, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate concurrent resolution 19 be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 388), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I wish to bring to the attention of the Congress the urgent need of legislation for the improvement of the personnel of the navy.

I am strongly of the opinion that the future of our navy will be seriously compromised unless the ages of our senior officers are materially reduced and opportunity is given thereby for experience and training for battle ship and fleet commands.

Under our present system the average age of captains is 55 years and of rear-admirals 60½ years.

This is the direct result of an absurd system which allows nearly all officers, provided they retain their health, to pass through the various grades and retire as rear-admirals.

The greater number of our older commanding officers have had inadequate experience in command. Experience in command of a large vessel in the battle fleet is essential to the command of a division or squadron of the fleet, and preliminary training in flag officers' duties is necessary before succeeding to the chief command of a fleet. We are now training officers in command of battle ships and armored cruisers, many of whom can not serve as flag officers on account of their short time on the active list after reaching that grade.

The line of the navy is in an abnormal condition, the result of past legislation.

There is still a "hump" in the flag and command grades, there is a great deficiency of officers of suitable ages for the intermediate grades, there is the beginning of a new "hump" in the lower grades, and the total of all the grades is very considerably short of the requirements of the service.

The Congress, in 1903, authorized an increase in the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy, without increasing correspondingly the grades of officers, and the result is now a large "hump" near the bottom of the list, due to the large classes graduated since that date. Unless legislation relieves the situation, these young officers will have little promotion for many years to come. From now on, about 160 officers per year will enter the junior lieutenants' grade, and, under existing law, but 40 a year will be promoted out of it; so that that grade will increase out of proportion to the others.

The following table shows the ages of the oldest and youngest and the average ages of the flag officers of different grades and captains in the English, French, German, Italian, Austrian, and United States navies at the present time:

[About January 1, 1910.]

	Great Britain.			France.
	Oldest.	Youngest.	Average.	Oldest.	Youngest.	Average.
Admirals of the fleet	70	65	68

Admirals of the fleet	[d]	[d]
Rear-admirals	62	58	60.5
Captains	61	50	55

[b] One only, 54 years.
[c] One only, 66 years.

The averages of rear-admirals of different countries, about January 1, 1910, were thus, as follows:

Japanese	50
German	51
Austrian	55
Italian	56
American	60.5

The effect of the proposed measure would be to promote our officers to the grade of rear-admiral at an average age of 54 to 55, and to make the average of all the rear-admirals about 58.

The average ages of captains about January 1, 1910, were, from the same table, as follows:

	Years.

The effect of the proposed measure would be to promote officers to the grade of captain at an average age of 46 to 47, and to make the average age of all the captains about 50.

The ages for rear-admirals and captains produced by the proposed measure are not young enough, in my opinion, for the arduous duties of the modern vessels of war and for the best success in a fleet engagement, should war come, but they are a decided improvement. To reduce the ages still further would not increase the cost; but for other reasons, I am unwilling to advocate any further reduction at the present time.

The creating of higher ranking flag officers is a military necessity. Through custom and tradition, at a time when the service was small, grades higher than that of rear-admiral were regarded as rewards of merit for exceptional war service. The size of the fleet now demands two grades above that of rear-miral of the fleet (grand admiral), admiral, vice-admiral, rear-found in foreign services. The customary naval grades are admiral of the fleet (grand admiral), admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral. Foreign fleets are commanded by admirals and vice-admirals. In international council, or in combined operations, the American admiral, whatever the importance of his command, must assume the junior position. In our Atlantic Fleet there are now four rear-admirals. There should be an admiral in command, a vice-admiral for the second squadron, and a rear-admiral for each of the other two divisions.

Considerations of proper military efficiency, as well as a due sense of national dignity and self-respect, as befitting this great Nation, urge that the existing situation shall cease.

The Secretary of the Navy has prepared a tentative bill for reorganizing the personnel of the navy, which is at the disposition of the Congress should it be desired. This proposed plan for relief meets with my hearty approval.

OUTLINE OF PROPOSED MEASURE.

The personnel of officers and men is based on the tonnage of effective ships. Increases or decreases of ships, due to authorization by Congress or to sale or other disposal, will increase or decrease the personnel in a fixed proportion. In time, though, the increases in new tonnage will be offset by old ships struck from the list. Adequate provisions are made to guard against sudden fluctuations in the personnel.

The ratio provided is 100 men and 5 line officers and midshipmen for every 2,000 tons of ships, including ships authorized and building, the principle being followed that it takes as long to train the midshipmen and enlist and train the men as it does to build the ships.

With 1,200,000 tons of ships, as now authorized, the ultimate personnel would reach 3,000 line officers and midshipmen and 60,000 enlisted men, but under the measure as drawn the full authorized strength of officers and men can not be reached for a number of years to come, nor in any case, except with the approval of the Congress year by year.

The officers, as now, are to be drawn from the Naval Academy, with certain additions from the ranks, as authorized by existing law; but it is not proposed to increase the present size of the Naval Academy classes, and it is estimated that under present conditions it will take about eight years for the full strength of officers to be reached.

As regards the men, the present authorized strength is 44,500. The current estimates provide for 47,500, which estimates are not to be altered. In future years, if approved by the Congress, the number can be brought up gradually to the proportion required for the actual ships, the present measure not authorizing any increase.

After the grades of officers assume the fixed proportions set for them there will be an excess in the upper grades due to promotion for length of service.

Each July 1 a board of high ranking officers recommends sufficient retirements to reduce such excess.

The rate of pay for such retired officers will depend on length of service. After eighteen years they would get about one-fourth pay, after twenty years about one-third pay, after twenty-four years about one-half pay, and after thirty years three-fourths pay.

The method of retirement is an important part of the proposed plan. At present too many officers reach the highest grade and retire with the rank of senior rear-admiral, without adequate return to the Government.

The present personnel law of 1899 has been in operation eleven years. In that time 304 officers have retired from age, length of service, or by operation of the law. In the next eleven years, if the proposed measure becomes operative, there will be about 138 retirements from the same causes, at a cost of less than one-half the former 304.

The lengths of service proposed for line officers in the various grades will bring promotion, at the latest, at the ages set forth following:

	Years.
Age at entry	18
Lieutenant (junior grade)	25
Lieutenant	28
Lieutenant-commander	36
Commander	42
Rear-admiral	55

The staff corps are put on the same basis as the line, as nearly as the requirements of the different corps will permit.

EXPENSE OF PROPOSED MEASURE.

In drawing up the measure which I have approved, a prime consideration was that there was to be no immediate increase in expense, nor, except for authorized increases in ships, any eventual increase.

On the basis of tonnage, any increase in both officers and men must be authorized each year by Congress when it authorizes ships.

The saving in this measure is principally in the retired list of the line. Under the present law, and that which preceded it, most retirements were from the higher grades at the higher rates of pay. Under the proposed plan, with the exception of the captains already due for promotion to the grade of rear-admiral, no increase of rank is allowed on retirement, and retirements will be distributed along the grades at rates of pay which depend on length of service.

Finally, I wish to emphasize to the Congress that this measure is intended primarily to reduce the ages of the officers in the senior grades of the line of the navy and to secure more efficient captains and flag officers.

Incidentally it is intended to increase the efficiency of the staff corps by providing some measure of compulsory retirement for them and some increases which are necessary.

While it might be possible to include improvement in some other minor details of the line and staff corps, these matters are not directly concerned with improving the military efficiency of the fleet, and I deem it best not to complicate the desired improvement by introducing them at this time.

The wisdom of Congress, urged by the overwhelming voice of the people of our country, has provided us with ships of the best quality. It is necessary that our personnel of officers match these superb vessels if the navy is to be at the efficiency which is vitally necessary for its chief purpose and only reason for existence.

I earnestly urge upon the Congress the passage of suitable personnel legislation.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 25, 1910.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to my colleague [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, when I took up for reading and study the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, I found that it stated that the total deficit for that year was $17,479,770.47. This showing was a great surprise to me, but I was simply astounded when I read, on page 6, the following:

> Recent investigations have shown that the two great sources of loss to the postal revenues are second-class mail matter and rural delivery.
> The loss on second-class mail matter has been increasing for many years, until it now amounts to more than $64,000,000.
> The loss from rural delivery, a service begun hardly a dozen years ago and of unprecedented growth, reaches nearly $28,000,000.

I had no idea that the loss to the Government on rural delivery was anything like the sum stated by the Postmaster-General.

Under the heading "Rural delivery," page 11 of said report, the following statement appears:

RURAL DELIVERY.

> The Rural Delivery Service has developed in twelve years from an experiment involving the disbursement of less than $15,000 to one of the largest branches of the postal establishment, with an annual expenditure exceeding $35,000,000. The postage on matter mailed on rural routes is estimated at about $7,250,000.

Further on in said report, under the heading "Cost of rural delivery," the following statement appears:

COST OF RURAL DELIVERY.

> On June 30, 1909, 40,628 rural routes were in operation. The expenditures on account of the rural service for the fiscal year ended on that date were $35,661,034. Compared with the previous year, there has been an increase of 1,351 routes and of $1,289,095 in expenses.
> From a count kept in March, April, and May, 1909, it was shown that the average amount of postage on mail collected on a rural route was $14.92 a month. The average monthly cost of the service on a route was $72.17. This means that the cost of service on a rural route exceeded the revenue derived from the postage on the mail originating thereon by $687 a year. On that basis the cost of all the rural routes in operation at the close of the last fiscal year exceeded the revenue from matter mailed thereon by more than $27,900,000.

Mr. Chairman, these extracts I have read from the last annual report of the Postmaster-General cover substantially all that is said by him regarding the cost of rural delivery, also as to the receipts from and the loss to the Government on account of that service.

When I first read this report, and before looking further into the facts that should be examined before passing judgment on this great branch of our domestic mail service, I confess I felt very much discouraged. I doubted whether the people would be willing to maintain and further extend a service which, as shown by the extracts I have just read, cost the Government $7 for every one it received from its patrons. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my conclusions and fears were but natural, without looking further into the matter than the annual report above referred to. It is but natural that we expect and have a right to expect, that the solemn annual report of the Postmaster-General shall contain, and in fact does contain, all information necessary to a fairly comprehensive and accurate understanding of all facts connected with the operations of his great department. There is no branch of the public service that so directly interests each and every individual person in the United States as does the postal service. Therefore it is so much the more important that the people be fully and correctly informed, not only as to the service as a whole, but as to each branch of the service treated independently.

I do not charge that the Postmaster-General has willfully misstated any fact in his report with regard to the rural service or that he has willfully failed to state any fact necessary to be considered in connection with this branch of the service, but I most respectfully submit if it is not a fact that his annual report is meager in its statement of facts, does not call attention to facts well known to the Postmaster-General, without the knowledge of which a comprehensive understanding of this branch of the postal service can not be had. So, in order to have a more perfect knowledge of facts which I then thought and now think should have been stated in his annual report, I addressed the following letter to the honorable Postmaster-General:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1910.

Honorable POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In your recent report you show in round numbers that the cost of the rural service, as estimated by you, is $35,000,000 per annum; that the receipts for mail collected on the rural routes is about $7,000,000, leaving what appears on the face of your report to be a clear net loss to the Government of about $28,000,000.

While I do not question the facts stated in your report, in fairness and in justice to the rural service, treated as an independent branch of the service, should there not be deducted from this $28,000,000 the cost to the Government of the star routes displaced and discontinued by reason of the establishment of rural service, and also some saving to the Government by the discontinuance of post-offices where the annual cancellations were so small that 100 per cent of these cancellations went to the post-offices discontinued, and the increased cancellations at offices where the routes initiated in which a less per cent of cancellations went to the postmaster as compensation, and thus save something to the Government due to the extension and development of rural service?

To be perfectly fair toward the rural service as an independent branch of the postal service, should it not be credited with the savings I have pointed out, together with such natural increase as the expenses of star-route service would have entailed had it not been displaced by the rural service? I mean by this that it would cost more to sustain the star-route service displaced at this time than it was costing the Government at the time the star-route service was discontinued.

While your report shows the gross loss to the Government by the rural service, it does not show the net loss, and as your report, as well as all others, should not be open to misconstruction, but should give information so fully as to leave no question as to the accuracy and as to the proper understanding of the report in detail as well as in whole, will it not be necessary to take from the total gross loss by rural service, as estimated by you, the cost of the star-route service displaced and the discontinuance of the post-offices where the compensation was larger in proportion to the cancellation than now exists?

If you can make something like a reasonable estimate of these economies in gross that should be credited on the total gross loss of cost of rural service, I shall be glad to have you do so.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. SIMS.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I wanted first to read the answer.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Before the answer is read, lest I might be thought to frame my question upon it, I would suggest to the gentleman that he is talking of a matter that I have been over somewhat, and I think we both want to be right in our arithmetic.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Assuming that the fourth-class postmaster displaced took the entire value of the stamps for cancellation, still then crediting to the rural delivery the value of the mail originating on those routes, the gentleman has already credited them with the salaries of all the postmasters, and as much more than the salary of the postmasters as the amount would exceed the postmasters' salaries.

Mr. SIMS. Of course the gentleman understands that my time is limited, but information is what we are all after, and as the gentleman is a member of the committee and can give it, I will be very glad to listen further if he will agree to extend my time.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, that is all at this time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Wait until I finish reading the answer of the Postmaster-General. I received the following reply thereto:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1910.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of February 8, 1910, in which you urge that the cost of Rural Delivery Service should be credited with the cost of any facility superseded by the establishment of rural delivery, and asking to be furnished with a reasonable estimate of the cost to-day of facilities which have been superseded by Rural Delivery Service incident to its institution and extension.

In reply I have to say that the annual cost of star-route service superseded by Rural Delivery Service, at the rate paid at the time of discontinuance, aggregates $3,050,000. Taking the increase or decrease in the rate of cost per mile of star-route service from year to year as a basis of computation, the increased cost of star service superseded by rural delivery, were it in operation to-day, would be approximately $647,000.

The aggregate of the compensation of postmasters at offices which have been discontinued as a result of the existence of Rural Delivery Service is approximately $1,369,000. This entire sum, however, can not be regarded as a saving, as a considerable portion of it is paid to postmasters at rural delivery distributing offices as compensation. There are no data available from which any computation can be made as to the proportion of this amount which is an actual saving.

It is not practicable to present an accurate statement or even a satisfactory approximation of the effect of rural delivery on the revenues of the postal service. The value of the postage on mail collected can be approximated very closely, and for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, was about $7,250,000, but a portion of this sum was paid as commissions to postmasters at offices of the fourth class, which are distributing offices for Rural Delivery Service. Exactly how much of the remainder can be credited to the cost of rural delivery can not be determined.

The institution of rural delivery has resulted in a marked increase in the volume of mail delivered to and dispatched from the territory supplied by rural service, the increase in four years being 96 per cent, with a consequent increase in revenue, but it is not possible to determine the proportion of this increased volume of mail that is due to the existence of rural delivery.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am glad that the gentleman has brought out this point. It ought to be discussed. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, and if he will examine the reports further on that point I think he will find that in 1897, when we were only appropriating $40,000 for rural service, there was a deficit in the Post-Office Department of upward of $11,000,000.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; and, of course, we should not charge this increase in deficit wholly to the rural delivery.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman taken into consideration that where the rural delivery service is established from a post-office it reduces the amount previously allowed for clerk hire in the distribution of star-route mail? I know I have had that up several times, where the department has declined to allow clerk hire at those offices, because it is no longer regarded as a distributing office for star routes.

Mr. SIMS. I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to that, but I have made no estimate of that saving to the Government on account of the establishment of the rural delivery.

It thus appears from the letter just read that the Postmaster-General did not embrace in his last annual report the facts brought out in reply to my letter of inquiry, which was as necessary to be stated in order to a full and comprehensive knowledge of the Rural Free-Delivery Service as the facts that were stated.

Mr. Chairman, I insist and charge that the meagerness of the Postmaster-General's annual report as to the rural service is such as to amount to a gross injustice to that branch of the service and such as to cause a misunderstanding of the facts and as to be wholly misleading to the public or anyone else who looks no further than the bald statements contained in his report.

In his report, under the heading "Cost of rural delivery," the Postmaster-General says:

This means that the cost of the service on a rural route exceeded the revenue derived from the postage on the mail originating thereon by $687 a year.

In making this computation, as appears from his report, he only included revenues derived from postage on mail collected on the rural routes. This is unjust, unfair, and misleading. All mail originating at the post-offices from which the rural routes initiate, going out on the several routes, having been handled by no other mail carrier, is mail originating on rural routes in all respects as fully as if collected by the rural carriers from the several boxes of patrons thereon. While it may be impossible to make a report of the exact number of pieces of mail thus originating at the post-offices from which rural routes emanate, it must be so large as to have been entitled to mention in the Postmaster-General's annual report, and which must be considered in a just treatment of the net cost of rural delivery.

Mr. Chairman, when we make a careful study of all the facts obtainable by the Postmaster-General bearing on the cost of rural delivery, and then consider how few he has brought out in his annual report and how misleading are these few facts stated, we are driven to the conclusion that he is not an enthusiastic friend of this great branch of our public service.

On page 62 of said report it appears that the total number of pieces of all mail handled by all branches of the mail service for the year 1909 was 14,004,577,271.

On page 34 of said report it appears that for the same year the rural carriers handled 2,723,262,000 pieces, which is nearly one-fifth of all pieces of mail handled by all branches of the service. In the same report, page 5, it appears that the total expenditures of the Post-Office Department for all purposes amounted to $221,004,102.89.

The total cost of rural delivery for same time was $35,000,000, or about one-sixth of the total expenditure. So, measured by the pieces of mail carried, the percentage of cost to service rendered on the rural routes is less than on all other branches of the mail service, while the increase in the number of pieces carried by the rural service for the last five years far exceeds the percentage of increase in any other branch of the service and shows an increase of net revenue in excess of the increase of cost for same period, thus assuring us that the percentage of net loss to the Government on account of rural delivery will diminish instead of increasing from year to year.

That we may have a fuller and better understanding of the facts bearing on rural service, I now read from page 6 of the last report of the honorable Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, made to the Postmaster-General for the year ending June 30, 1909:

The installation of rural delivery, as a rule, has been followed by an increase in the amount of mail delivered and collected within the territories respectively served by that service. During the earlier years this increase was gradual, as a whole. In order to ascertain the percentage of mail carried on rural-delivery routes, a count was kept during the months of March, April, and May, and taken as a basis of conservative calculation, which showed that rural carriers throughout the United States handled during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, the enormous bulk of 2,723,262,000 pieces. During the four years succeeding June 30, 1905, the number of routes advanced 26 per cent, but the increase in the amount of mail delivered was 87 per cent, and mail collected 151 per cent, or an increase of 96 per cent in the whole amount handled. There was an increase of 149 per cent in the number of money orders issued, and 91 per cent increase in the number of letters registered. In 1905 the average number of pieces of mail handled per route per month was 3,600. Based upon the count kept during March, April, and May, mentioned, the average number of pieces now handled per route per month is 5,600—the largest in the history of the service. Another significant fact is that on only 2,117, or 5.2 per cent, of the rural routes was the quantity of mail handled less than 9,000 pieces per quarter, which is considered a fair average for a standard route.

Additional evidence of the increase in the amount of mail passing through rural delivery is furnished in the fact that 992 routes handled 25,000 or more pieces of mail during the three months ended June 30, 1907, and 3,232 routes 25,000 or more during the three months ended May 31, 1909.

In 1907, 27 routes handled more than 50,000 pieces of mail during the quarter ended June 30; in 1909, 95 routes more than 50,000 during the quarter ended May 31. On 35 of these routes the value of the stamps on mail collected for the period indicated exceeded $200. On 24 routes this item exceeded the carrier's salary.

Mr. Chairman, I now read further from page 6 of said report:

The following statement shows the amount of mail of the various classes handled on rural routes during the year 1909 (an approximation based upon the three months' count herein described) and the year 1905, the increase, and the percentage of increase:

	Year 1909 (approximated).	Year 1905.	Increase.	Per cent of increase.

This remarkable increase is conclusive evidence that the institution of rural delivery has enlarged the amount of the mails handled, and therefore increased the revenues. This is true, although 45 per cent of the bulk of the mail on rural routes is second-class matter, as the increase applies to all classes of matter, especially to letters and postal cards, the latter due to the enormous use of souvenir or picture post cards.

Is it not a little remarkable that with these facts, all in the possession of the honorable Postmaster-General when he wrote his last annual report, he said, in bold, brutal, cold-blooded fashion, that the loss to the Government on rural delivery for the last fiscal year was $28,000,000?

It will be seen by the above detailed statement of the Fourth Assistant that the total pieces of mail delivered for that year was 2,278,239,864, while the total pieces collected for same period on rural routes was only 445,022,288, while the Postmaster-General seemingly takes into account in determining costs only the mail collected on the several rural routes, ignoring altogether any account of the vast volume of mail delivered, and giving the rural service no credit for any share in the profits derived in the delivery for that year of 1,321,380 registered letters and packages, 464,154,856 letters, 259,996,180 postal cards, 279,927,200 circulars, and 46,324,284 packages, making the grand total of 1,051,723,900 pieces of mail delivered on which the Government received a profit, while the total number of pieces of second-class mail delivered for the same period was 1,226,515,964, showing that only about 45 per cent of all pieces of mail delivered on rural routes is of the second class. It also appears for the last four years the rate of increase on registered mail delivered has been 107 per cent; on letters, 90 per cent; postal cards, 410 per cent; circulars, 136 per cent; packages, 99 per cent; while that of second class—the unprofitable mail—is only 58 per cent. It thus appears that the increase of unprofitable mail delivered on rural routes for the last four years has been only about half the increase in profit-paying mail for the same time, thus demonstrating that the net expenses of rural delivery, viewed from the standpoint of mail delivered, is growing less all the time.

Mr. Chairman, viewed from the standpoint of mail collected on the rural routes for the last fiscal year the facts are as follows:

Registered letters collected, 1,074,868; increase for four years, 74 per cent; letters collected, 273,616,060; increase for four years, 80 per cent; postal cards collected, 157,284,036; increase for four years, 846 per cent, or over 200 per cent per annum; circulars, 4,939,656; increase for four years, 59 per cent; packages, 4,587,700; increase for four years, 47 per cent; newspapers, 3,519,968; increase for same period, 49 per cent. Thus showing as a whole that the grand total of pieces of mail collected on rural routes for last fiscal year on which the Government receives a profit, was 441,502,320 pieces, while the total pieces of second-class mail in which the Government incurs a loss was only 3,519,968.

Viewed from the standpoint of mail collected, nearly all of which is profit-paying mail, the cost of rural delivery is being rapidly reduced as must necessarily appear from the most casual examination of these figures.

Mr. Chairman, I have accepted the report of the honorable Postmaster-General as to loss on second-class matter as being in excess of $64,000,000; for the last fiscal year, as being accurate or substantially so, I have no means of finding out the facts or the methods used in arriving at this item of net loss on second-class mail, but if he is as far away from substantial accuracy in that matter as he is in rural delivery, we can not justify such drastic action as at first seemed necessary in the way of increasing the rate of postage on second-class mail matter. Further investigation and study will be necessary before final action if mistakes are to be avoided.

Mr. Chairman, rural delivery is the idol of the country people, and no man or political party can long survive if just suspicion of his or its unfriendly attitude is once aroused. This fact must be well known to the present Postmaster-General, in view of which I am exceedingly surprised, that he should do or say anything or fail to say anything that will give reasonable grounds to charge him with lack of sympathy for and energetic championship of this great and growing arm of the public service.

Mr. Chairman, I beg to call the attention of the House to page 4 of the report of the honorable Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General recently made to the Postmaster-General under the heading "Rural letter carriers," which reads as follows:

RURAL LETTER CARRIERS.

During the past year 2,526 resignations of carriers were accepted, which is 19 per cent greater than the number accepted during the preceding fiscal year; whereas there was a decrease in the number of resignations from the year ended June 30, 1907. However, the number of carriers resigning is only 6 per cent of the number of carriers in the service June 30, 1909. Two hundred and three carriers were separated from the service by death. Out of 40,499 carriers only 175 were dismissed for cause, which is an increase of but 10 over the number during the previous fiscal year. Of the carriers dismissed, 36 were for embezzlement of funds and 35 for intoxication.

I pause to ask: Was there ever such a record made in the public service of any government—city, State, or national—in the history of the world, ancient or modern, where out of a body of 40,499 officials there was so small a number of dismissals for cause in one year? Think for a moment, that each and every one of this vast army of government officials each and every day of his official service handles actual sums of money, of currency, and only 36 out of the 40,000 yielded to the ever-present temptation and became embezzlers. I beg you, Mr. Chairman, to consider the almost unbelievable statement that out of this number of more than 40,000 men selected from every part of every State in these United States, who must go through heat and cold, mud and dust, fair weather and foul, that the dismissals for drunkenness for a whole year were only 35. Where is there another nation on this earth that can make such an exhibit of honesty and good behavior in any equal number of its citizens subject to like temptations and hardships?

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of this great body of our best men. To this great army of model citizens I point with pride as the best evidence of the fruit of our glorious free institutions.

But there is another side to this picture. One suggestive of injustice, one not calculated to quiet the conscience, one not calculated to cause us to feel that we properly and fully appreciate the great services of this vast number of our most worthy citizens. The maximum salary of a rural letter carrier is $900 per annum, while the maximum salary of a city letter carrier is $1,200 per annum. Why this difference?

The city carrier has a legal eight-hour day. He has no expense by way of equipment. He has paved streets and sidewalks upon which to travel while he makes his rounds. The rural carrier must often start in the winter before daylight and return in the night. He has poorly kept country roads over which to make his weary journey. He must furnish himself with at least two horses and a wagon or buggy, which cost him an outlay of from $400 to $600; he must pay for frequent repairs of the vehicle; he must be at a daily expense in feeding and caring for his horses; none of said expenses are incurred by the city carrier, yet he is paid 25 per cent more for his work than is paid to the rural carrier.

Mr. Chairman, I denounce such discrimination as rank, inexcusable injustice.

I know that it is said that the living expenses of the city carrier are greater. This is not true to as great an extent as may first appear. In the first place, the city carrier has only eight hours of service; he is often enabled to do something by which he can earn something in addition to his salary. Then he has advantages of good public schools for his children all the year round and the further advantage of public high schools for his children, in which a fairly good college education can be had free of cost, which advantages are almost unknown to the rural carrier. The difference in the food cost of living is not so great as may seem at first blush. The rural carrier does not and can not live out in the country on a farm. He must live where his route initiates, which is nearly always in a town or village, where the difference in the prices of food products is simply the freight charge from the town to the nearest city, which is usually a small per cent of the total cost. The price of feed-stuff, corn and hay, for the rural carriers' horses has advanced in an equal ratio with the cost of living to the family. Since the last increase of salary for rural carriers the cost of living has increased fully 25 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, there may be some States in the Union where the roads are so good that one horse can do the service of two and where the present compensation for rural carriers is fairly remunerative, but I am convinced that in a much larger number of States the present salary or compensation ought to be increased to $1,200 for all carriers now receiving $900 and all others increased in like ratio. Nothing less is compensative, and if present high prices are to continue I can not see how the service can fail to be crippled, if not greatly retarded. We can not afford to let this great and beneficial service retrograde, we must do simple justice to this most deserving class of our public servants and vote them a maximum salary of at least $1,200 per annum, and thus in salary, if no further, put them on a level with the city carriers, who walk upon smooth pavements, cross asphalt-covered streets, have the protection of awnings, and bask in the shade of beautiful parks to the music of playing fountains and city-paid bands, while the poor dust-covered, mud-bespattered rural carrier homeward plods his weary way.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the matter of a $13,000,000 deficit in our postal revenues in 1908 nor a $17,000,000 deficit in the following year, probably slightly to be increased in the next, is not a matter about which I have more than a slight concern. With me the present condition of the postal revenues is not of importance to-day, except in the sense that it points the finger of warning toward the by and by. I became interested in a little postal investigation about 1880. I can still see the figures on which I was then working, and the aggregate of the bill was less than $40,000,000. In a little less than three decades to get the aggregate of the present bill we multiply by six the figures of thirty years ago; and still, as regularly as the years come and go, we are adding about the same annual percentage of increase. If this is to continue through the next three decades—and there is nothing to indicate the contrary—the post-office appropriation bill for the year 1940, together with the cost of the department, will carry about one and one-half billions of dollars. Then the difference in percentage between the two sides of the ledger will have become a vital matter.

Everybody, I take it, who has served long on the Post-Office Committee sees here and there an opportunity to make real improvement. It has been patent, I take it, to everybody familiar with the subject for the last twenty years that in the interest of simple justice our mail matter needs a reclassification. Experts have agreed on that, but they have differed radically as to whether the number of classes should be increased or decreased, and it somehow happens—I am not going to intimate that any powerful parties at every proposition to revise the service play the ink fish—it always happens, however, that something quite irrelevant and unimportant is brought out and fired at the people in continuing volleys as the great and pivotal question on which everything ought to turn. When there was some talk of reclassifying mail matter, with no definite determination as to whether the postage should be raised on any, we could scarcely look a print in the face without being told of what Germany was doing for her people in the way of postal service. It was made to appear disreputable to the United States that our Government should deal less favorably with our people than the Empire of Germany did with hers. Well, we are not hearing anything about that now, for it appears that at last it has percolated sufficiently into the public minds that there is no comparison in any respect as to mail matters between Germany and the United States.

Their country is so very much smaller and the average haul so very much less; the fixed limitation upon grades and salaries of employees, and, besides, the Government owns the railroads, or if giving a private party the right to construct a railroad imposes the condition of carrying the mails, carrying troops and munitions in time of war, I think, and what not; and when the authorities come to fix the rate on passenger and freight traffic, it seems that the German pays so roundly for those mail facilities, concerning which we heard so much, he would be better off, indeed, if he could pay for them directly.

A gentleman with whom I happen to be very well acquainted found it necessary a few years ago to ship some coarse potash about 42 miles along the Elbe, because the river was frozen up. He was amazed on the receipt of his freight bill to find it was $1.12 a ton. He said that there was not a branch or a high-cost railroad in the United States that would charge him over 60 cents for that, not possibly over 70 cents. He learned that the 52 cents per ton was his share of the mail service and other services performed by the Government of Germany. Very well; we are not hearing about that nowadays. But just now it happened that our post-office matters were being investigated.

The postal commission had done a good deal of work and the President had spoken. Some gentlemen wanted a hearing, and behold, we found one morning a new and mighty problem before Congress and mankind, "How did Canada manage her mail system?" Publications of high repute said that all movements in the United States should be delayed until conditions and results in Canada could be explained. This was the information for which a hungry world felt a gnawing at the vitals. I have known a little, not much perhaps, about Canadian postal affairs for some time, but it had never occurred to me that they furnished a single element for an equation or that could be used in the solution of our problems in the United States. Some facts in regard to Canada I perhaps know, and since a number of Members have said to me that their correspondents were copying articles referring to the new problem and they needed information about the subject, I am willing to give the limited amount which I have.

Canada receives, as I deduce, about $9,000,000 of mail revenue. The report says, in cold type, that the government receives $7,410,623.93, but they have a system of nonaccounting post-offices, and from the accounts balanced before return we may deduce that the total receipts are $9,997,913.94. The conclusion is that the result in nonaccounting offices shows an addition to the $7,410,623.93 of about $2,401,623.93, and inasmuch as the accounts are made to balance, an increase of her expenses by about the same amount.

So we have to compare with the mail system of the United States another system which involves less than $10,000,000. We, in the report for 1908, spent $210,000,000. The aggregates are very wide apart. Let us see about some percentages. I can not compare conditions, for I have not investigated them in Canada. They seem to have an internal service something akin to our rural delivery, the service being along the star routes. But her star-route service, her mail messenger service, her screen-wagon service, if she has it, and her rural delivery to the extent that she has it are charged under one heading, that of "Inland transportation of the mails," and it is $1,508,000, or 16 per cent of her gross expenditure. Add together our screen-wagon service, our rural mail, and sundry other items that go into that sort of delivery and the star-route service and we get something like 14 per cent of our gross expenditure. So we are bound to conclude that Canada has an internal system that is of greater importance in percentage of her revenue than ours is to us, rural delivery included. There is only about 2 per cent difference. That is a little in our favor on these items. So if we are to save anything by modeling after Canada, that is not the item out of which we are to get the economy.

Well, Canada has a railway mail service which she runs a little more than half as frequently per route as we run ours. The proportion is 1,100 and above to 1,900 and above. She has a railway postal-car system. I have not seen the cars, but of the last 30 new routes established, 21 of them are marked "Served by R. P. O." Nine of them are marked "Served by B. C."

I inquired from a gentleman who thought he knew what that meant, and he said "baggage car." So that on all these routes mail handed in at a post-office at B, if it is for C, it is not delivered when the car gets there. It goes to some distributing office and is there reworked, and goes back by a later train to the post-office that it has passed. But in the ration of items of expenditure their railway mail pay per pound for its greatest possible weight, even with this kind of service, must materially exceed ours.

Canada has a classification of mail matter very much like ours. In fact, the system seems to be copied just as closely after that of this country as it is possible to copy one system after another under different conditions. Her classifications are practically the same, if not identical. Her rates on three classes are identical. Her rate on second-class matter is less.

She had in the last year, or the last year that I have a report of, derived $133,000 from second-class matter, at half a cent a pound for most of it, if not all, indicating a weight of 26,000,000 pounds, which is about one-thirtieth of the second-class matter we carry, but we carry about 26 times as much and do some 32 times the gross business in weight, so her proportion of second-class matter is less than ours, but not materially less. It is going to be very materially less. The postal rates on foreign periodicals have been advanced by Canada to 4 cents per pound. There is plenary authority in the postmaster-general to admit or to refuse to admit to second-class privilege in Canada whatever foreign publication he will; and the indications are, judged by results up to this time, that a low percentage of American periodicals are going to be admitted to second-class rates in Canada. So that while she has reduced the postage on second-class matter to a quarter of a cent a pound, she is calculating on a saving on former losses. At half the former rate, the diminished quantity will reduce the loss.

Now, that scheme seems to please our publishers, if we may judge by what we read.

Now, Canada has $800,000 surplus. The United States has, according to the figures for 1908, $13,000,000 of deficit. I suppose that every gentleman on this floor now has received letters calling his attention to that fact, and probably charging incompetency on the part of our own Post-Office Department.

I find by the statement that I have already made that, in comparison with Canada, we can save nothing by striking out our rural delivery and other inland service, as on that her percentage exceeds ours. We can find no relief or remedy in turning to the railway-mail service over there because apparently by their mileage system they are paying more per pound, and perhaps considerably more a pound, than is the United States. We are left, unfortunately, to find the entire difference in the outcome in the United States and Canada of two systems, very similar and operated on the same plans, in the difference in the percentage of salaries paid. That may or may not have a relation to the size of the salary—the amount of a given salary. It may result from their greater slowness, indicated by the statistics given, being in about the proportion of 11 to 19 here in the matter of speed in the delivery of the mails.

But the truth is, that of this post-office appropriation bill, 60 per cent of it is carried for salaries. Take the Canadian reports, charge all the salaries that the postmaster-general has paid and charged as salaries in his report, and the balances of the transactions in the nonaccounting offices, try to build it up, as an advocate of the superiority of that service might do, so that you will not find a discrepancy in the salary rates, and you get theirs up to 47 per cent. The difference between 47 and 60 in our expenditures at the close of the year 1908 would be nearly $26,000,000, wiping out the deficit and leaving $13,000,000 surplus.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentlemen, if you were to leave out the expenses of the rural service, have you then made a comparison?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I had those figures but have not incorporated them.

Mr. LLOYD. They have the star-route service, with the box system, have they not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. That is, delivery along star routes. They have no regular rural-delivery system?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. No. I could not determine just what they do have from the report. I think we can readily solve the problem mentally, can we not, taking the rural delivery out?

Mr. FORNES. The figures which the gentleman gave as to the proportionate amount for salaries in their service and in our service were 47 per cent and 60 per cent——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. A difference of 13 per cent.

Mr. FORNES. We could hardly save anything in that direction, because that is virtually the commercial difference in salaries between the United States and Canada, is it not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not know. I think it certainly above 8 per cent, and possibly 15.

Mr. FORNES. I think it to be the fact that 13 is about correct.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I was simply saying here that they were saving a little money, about 10 per cent, and we were losing money, and that by comparison of the items of expenditure I endeavored to find the place to locate that difference. I could not find it in the Railway Mail Service; I could not find it in the inland service; and could not find it anywhere in the account until it came to the amounts paid for salaries. I noticed that our 1908 bill was carrying $136,000,000 out of $210,000,000, and yet I am not saying that their salaries are high or low. It is just a question of difference in figures.

Mr. FORNES. As I understand it, our great loss is owing to the fact of the salaries that we are paying. The statement I understood you to make was that 60 per cent of the entire cost of the mail service is paid out in salaries, and what I wished to make clear was that there is a difference between the salaries in Canada and in the United States, owing to the greater cost of living and in every way the greater expense, so that that difference is only a normal one.

Mr. FASSETT. That would apply to the relative cost of railroad service and every other service in the same way.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Of course, that difference would apply all through.

And now, you gentlemen must take the responsibility for putting into my comparisons this cost element, or dollar value element, which furnishes the shortest cut to a full comparison, but which I had decided to leave out, solely from an indisposition at this time to even call attention to the fact of the higher prices prevailing here than in some other places.

Of course, if our dollar has the purchasing power in Canada of $1.13, then Canada charges a higher postage rate than we do by 13 per cent. Thirteen per cent on Canada's $10,000,000 is $1,300,000, which wipes out her $800,000 surplus and writes in its place a half-million deficit; then her beauty and her power as a post-office example are gone. On the other hand, increase our incomes by 13 per cent and you add nearly $26,000,000 to our revenue, and our $13,000,000 deficit is changed to a $13,000,000 surplus.

Suppose the difference of the power of the dollar here and there is but 8 per cent; then Canada is charging an 8 per cent higher rate of postage than her figures express.

This would about exactly strike out her surplus.

Now, add 8 per cent to our rate, and our income increases $16,000,000, equal to our deficit, with a remainder of $3,000,000 of surplus.

If the difference is 10 per cent, Canada at our postal rates has a deficit of $200,000; the United States would have a surplus of nearly $10,000,000.

There is another consideration that would enter the calculation, to some extent, but I can state no percentages of different costs. Canada, in handling her second-class matter, as I understand it, follows the German plan, and sends along with it a very low-salaried clerk—in fact, a man who does not rank as a clerk at all—and the second-class matter is put off at the various stations through which they pass.

Mr. MURDOCK. Just for information, not to interrupt the gentleman's argument, what proportion of the 60 per cent in the United States is composed of postmasters' salaries and what proportion of the 47 per cent in Canada is postmasters' salaries?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I did not figure on that percentage, nor can I deduce it from the Canadian report other than in this way: The first table states flatly that their net income is a certain figure and their gross income a certain figure. In a table you will find in the accounts from the nonaccounting offices $2,370,000, made up of salaries and shopkeeper's accounts—that is, twine and such stuff, I suppose; and the indications that I gather from it are that $2,000,000 is composed of the salaries of postmasters and assistant postmasters, or salaries of postmasters and such other employees as they have a right to pay out of the postal funds. Now, if those salaries amount to $2,000,000 and their gross expenditure is $9,000,000, then the postmasters' salaries amount to two-ninths of their total expense, and theirs would be a very much higher percentage than ours on those figures.

Now, we have some items that they have not, such as pneumatic tubes. If they have the substations in the larger cities, such as we have, there is nothing from which I deduce it. Their accounts are not like ours, though in a general way this system that has been held up to us in letters sometimes as superior is copied right after our own. The two are alike, but our administration secures better results and greater economy, upon the whole.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the only variation in their system of postage rates on the second class? Do they charge the same for first class, third class, and fourth class as we do?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. They do. They have first class; then second class, papers and so on; third class, printed matter, books, and like things; fourth class, merchandise; so that the classification is not only about identical, but the prices are identical, expressed in figures, 2, 8, and 16. The railway mail system is copied after ours, but their method of pay is on some sort of a mileage plan rather than a weight plan, but they pay unquestionably something more per pound than we do for railway mail transportation. As to the inland service, it amounts to a little higher percentage than ours, including the rural delivery. So, trace it along, and you find out where the difference is between the thirteen million deficit and the $800,000 profit, and you are left almost entirely to the difference of percentage in salaries or difference in dollar value.

Now, I would like to say to the gentleman who questioned me a little while ago that that difference comes by no means out of the different amounts paid to different men engaged in the service. I think we make great sacrifices to expedition. We cover, as I have said, in our railway postal routes an average of nineteen hundred and more times a year, and they eleven hundred and more times, indicating that their mail is held back, goes less frequently, in larger proportions, and can be handled by a less number of employees.

My advice is that their second-class matter is not handled by the railway mail carriers, but by cheaper men. So that while there may be a difference the table would indicate the rates of salary paid, and we are sacrificing a considerable percentage to our expenditure for expedition, for more speed. We can not have anything go on wheels unless it carries a mail. A road here put on a sixteen-hour train from New York to Chicago, and they charge $10 extra to ride on it. Neither you nor I, going around the foothills of the Alleghenies, want more than three cars on that train, but it had not run long before the mails rammed in and said, "We belong on this, too."

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman inform us whether the mail trains make better time in this country than they do in Canada?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. My understanding is that our general schedule is faster here than it is in Canada; I am speaking of the general railroad schedules.

Mr. FORNES. It is a self-evident proposition that speed costs money.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; and we make more frequent dispatches of the mail. I suppose quantities of mail matter in the other country is held back and dispatched, perhaps, in two dispatches a day, while we would send four or five.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Are express companies in Canada permitted to handle mail matter?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I have not the slightest knowledge about that, because the Postmaster-General's report would not show it any more than an examination of our report would show it here. Since that matter is brought up, and as this seems to be a rambling sort of an hour, I want to say something about the carrying of mail by express companies, or rather the sending by express of matter that would be mailable. I think my friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] the other day advocated the enforcing of the government monopoly on mailable matter. I would have to change my views before I could favor that. We who subscribe for publications and get them through the mail in the East pay 1 cent a pound, or the publisher does, on that mail. We think that it may pay the Government for hauling that mail, that it only loses in the carriage or delivery. But my friend from California may be getting the same publication, and the Government is probably paying 6 cents to carry it to him. So, so far as my interest in the National Treasury goes, I am already paying a tax to help him get his magazine. If I want them in quantity, I do not want to be further taxed by compelling the publisher to put into the mail 100 pounds of something that may be brought by freight or express for 50 or 60 cents.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman allow me one question more?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Would it make any difference in the cost of publication to require them to send it by mail rather than by express in your neighborhood?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Oh, I can not answer that. These things are all worked up by averages. My understanding is that the magazine published in New York goes up to Boston by freight or express at, say, 75 cents a hundred. Whether the publisher would charge any more for it if he had to send it some other way I do not know.

Mr. AUSTIN. It retails in Boston and New York at the same price it does in San Francisco, does it not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly it does, on the system of averages.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman proposed an equation in which there were two parties, himself and the gentleman from California. I propose an equation in which there are three parties in interest, the Government, the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from California. Now, if we are to cover this country with a uniform rate, naturally we, by maintaining a monopoly in the carriage of any class of mail matter, will possibly make some money on the short haul, as we are rather certain to lose it on the long haul. Does not the gentleman think, then, that when the Government as a third party to this transaction surrenders its carriage on the short haul and retains it only on the long haul, the Government, regardless of the interests of the gentleman from New Jersey, gets the worst of it?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; the Government gets the worst of it; but, Mr. Chairman, my opinion of the mail system is that when it comes to anything so much a matter of commerce as periodicals in bulk, if the mail steps into the matter at all, it should be to assist the citizen at the point beyond which he can not get them by some other method more cheaply. I do not believe that it is the business of the Government or the right of the Government on a matter that is so much merchandise as half a car of magazines, or a hundred pounds of them, for that matter, to compel a citizen to send them to Boston by mail, and not by some other method, if he prefers it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course, the gentleman makes an exception with regard to first-class mail.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Oh, the letter business! It is out of the question for an individual to ever handle his own letters, and nobody will ever produce enough letters to make it worth while for him to send them by freight or some other way and have them delivered, one by one, to the addressees. That is beyond imagination, even.

Further, as to this compulsory monopoly of the mail, Mr. Chairman, I can not figure it out, including the delivery, just as some gentlemen have figured it out; and it is my opinion that, while by declaring a monopoly of that mail you may decrease the percentage of loss per pound on all of it you handle, nevertheless the aggregate loss will be increased according to the degree of rigidity with which you enforce the monopoly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What have you to say as to substituting space for weight, paying for the cars used at a certain rate per mile, full or empty?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. In the consideration of revision of methods of railway-mail pay I have met this difficulty in the space-payment method: It would increase the cost of the mail which is now most expensive to the Government, and possibly reduce the cost of the mail which is transported most cheaply, and this would accentuate the differences which are now used by critics as a weapon in assaults upon our pay system. We now pay $171 per mile of track per annum for 5,000 pounds of mail, but we pay $42.50 per track mile per annum for less than 200 pounds of mail. The 200 pounds with workable room requires, say one-fifth of the floor space that 5,000 pounds requires, which would make our 100 pounds of mail cost not less than $9 a trip, but $34 a trip per mile per annum. The floor space used in our apartment cars nearly equals the floor space used in our post-office cars in the aggregate, so while the space method might be more equitable it would so emphasize the greater cost of our apartment-car mails as to possibly bring about greater pressure for their curtailment as a means of economy, but this curtailment is precisely what much more than 50 per cent of our people do not desire.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is there a postal savings bank or a parcels post in Canada?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Canada has a postal savings-bank system. She has no parcels post except as our fourth-class classification is used as a parcels post, and if she has one it goes at 16 cents a pound.

There has been a good deal of criticism, Mr. Chairman, and it is natural, of our Post-Office Department, the executive capacity of its officials, and its administration. I think I ought to say now that in seeking information, in going through its reports and others, I become justified in the assertion that whatever the faults of our own department, it is the best on the globe. [Applause.]

And whatever the faults of its own reports, they are the best published by any government on the face of the earth. [Applause.] And you can get more of the exact truth out of them and know more of the operations of your own postal system from your own reports than you can that of any other nation by their reports. One of the usual criticisms, as we all know, is lodged alike as against Congress and the department, I would suppose, that we are paying more to the railroads than we ought to pay. I hold no brief from the railroads, Mr. Chairman, and if we are paying them too much I am as anxious as any man here to find it out. I freely confess that by every comparison I have been able to make I have thought if it is either way, they were underpaid. A gentleman whom I will not now name, but whom I believe to be the best expert in such matters on top of the ground, says that he thinks the system ought to be revised in the interest of simplicity, but the results will be the raise of the pay as an aggregate. To-day, in looking for some matters, I happened to return to the report of the Wolcott commission, and there I found, over the signatures of Eugene Loud, Senator Wolcott, Justice Moody, men of caliber and probity, a statement that the cost per railway mail route in England, Ireland, and Wales, with their dense population in most parts, was four hundred and odd dollars per route, as against $190 in the United States; but as the methods of computations were different, they could not make the exact comparison by pounds, but felt safe in saying that in densely peopled England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, the Government of England is paying more per pound for the carrying of her mail than is the United States, and since those words were written the railway mail pay in the United States has been reduced from 17 to 20 per cent.

Mr. FASSETT. Have you at command the comparison which that same commission made and reported upon as between the cost here and in Germany, and also in France and Canada? It will be interesting to put it in the RECORD right here.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I have not it. If I had recalled that they reported anything on Canada, I would gladly have put it in the RECORD.

Mr. FASSETT. They printed Bradley's report. He is superintendent of the Railway Mail Service in New York. He made this statement in several forms: That so far as he could find routes in this country and Canada which were comparable one to the other, and so far as he could compare services which were fairly comparable one with the other, the Canadian cost was nearly two to one in every instance—twice as much in Canada as in the United States as to the railroads, and almost a similar thing in Germany.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not feel justified in occupying any more time. I only meant to endeavor to come as near as I could to answering questions which might be asked, particularly about this Canadian system, since our mails have been loaded with the potent query.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. KEIFER. What I want to get at from you or somebody is whether they have the rural route system of delivering mail that is anything like in character to that in the United States. My understanding is that it is a mere incident to some star routes or something of that kind, but not a rural free delivery as we have it.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have not been there to see it and know nothing whatever of it except what I can deduce from the reports. As I have said before, they pay for their star routes and their rural service, whatever it is, and screen wagon service and like things, a greater percentage of their total expenditure than we pay for ours, rural delivery included. So it ought to be a pretty thorough system of rural delivery by star routes.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the statement you just repeated. That was very clear. I have been trying to find out whether they had anything that was at all comparable with our system of delivering mail frequently through the rural regions of Canada.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Nothing that they call a rural delivery system.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it the equivalent of ours in any way?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, perhaps as nearly equivalent as the delivery and the taking up of letters by our star-route carriers could do.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask the gentleman this: Second-class publications in the United States go at 1 cent a pound. In Canada they go at one-fourth of a cent a pound, and for a considerable period our publications going into Canada went at one-fourth of a cent a pound——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That was for a very short period.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was for a very short period. After an interim Canada then placed a rate of 4 cents a pound on American publications reaching Canada. Now, is it any part of the Canadian system, in your judgment, to build up that system by the low-class rate of one-fourth of a cent a pound?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I suppose we are not at liberty here to ask the stenographer to lift his pencil. Canada has two motives unquestionably. One is to foster within Canada such literature as she wants, and the other is to exclude from Canada such literature as their chief postal official thinks Canada does not want by a prohibitive postage rate——

Mr. FASSETT. The discrimination is 16 to 1, which is Democratic. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the postmaster-general of Canada does not differentiate between the character of publications, but that all American magazines, for instance, would be charged at the rate of 4 cents a pound. That is true, is it not?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. They can all go in at 4 cents a pound; but the postmaster-general of Canada may admit any foreign publication he pleases to the second-class rate in Canada.

Mr. BENNET of New York. He has plenary powers, has he?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I understood so.

Mr. FASSETT. If you are through with your speech, I should be very glad if you would illuminate the RECORD on something about the fact that express charges are hardly comparable to mail charges.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. We will take that up "by request." You see, I have no notes.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that it is my opinion—and I think I have a right to it—that railway-mail pay here in the United States is less, on any fair basis of computation, than it is anywhere else in the world.

After all this Canada $800,000 surplus that was to dazzle and blind us by being thrown suddenly in our faces, we hear Uncle Sam is paying more than the express companies for these cars. Take a 20-mile route on an apartment car carrying 100 pounds of mail, $42.50 per track-mile per annum. They pay to the railroad companies $8.50 per annum. Well, if you compute that on the basis of 100 pounds of mail, of course it is very high; but if you compute it on a basis of space in the car, why equally, of course, it is ridiculously low.

A dealer asked me last winter why he could not get as good treatment in the cars as Uncle Sam. I said, "What do you mean?" "Why," he said, as he figured it out, "the Government is paying $2.58 a day for this space. I will pay $8 a day for it." I asked, "What do you want with it?" He said, "I want to send poultry and truck in it in the morning, and to bring something back in the evening—material that would command a very low rate of freight." [Laughter.] Take the railway-mail matter, Mr. Chairman. Assume that we put in a car 5,000 pounds of mail and six men to work it. Run it to Chicago; it makes $230 plus $5.50—$235.50. Well, we will say $235. That is about what it would amount to. The rate to Chicago for passengers is $17.50 each. Take a passenger car with 13 or 14 passengers only, or one-third full; it yields more money than the mail car pays. If there is an express car on the train holding, say, 8 tons, much of it may be magazines and heavy matter, which are taken very cheaply. A package comes down that contains milady's hat, and it doubtless pays 35 cents a pound, perhaps 50 cents. If there be some valuable papers on which a high value is set, they pay four. five, or six dollars a pound. If there is money in there and the bills are large enough, it is paying several thousand dollars a pound, and so on. When the car is made up, it is a ridiculously low assumption to state that the average rate of the stuff in the car will be 3½ cents a pound. Three and one-half cents a pound would be about $560; 60 per cent, $336; $41 more than the railway postal car pays to the railroad.

Mr. FORNES. Right there I would like to ask the gentleman a question on the express car and the mail car. The express car will earn more money than the mail car. But whatever there is in the express car the companies will be liable for because of fire, theft, or negligence. Now, what represents the compensation in that respect concerning the railway mails?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The car has in it six men in the government employ. Working on their feet, they are more likely than the rest to be injured. They claim a right to additional salary on that account, and they have the same claim of liability that is given to a passenger in the parlor car against the company.

Mr. FORNES. I admit, then, their liability is greater concerning the mail car.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if there is any reasonable basis or any reasonable comparison on which to figure down this railway-mail pay, I am looking for it, and the first gentleman that feels that he is possessed of it I hope will share his treasure with me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is charged that they carry heavy freight, such as the magazines you have mentioned, and also daily papers, at one-half a cent a pound by express, while they charge the United States Post-Office for carrying the mail 1 cent a pound. Why that difference?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Before I could answer why there was the difference, the difference would have to be established. The testimony of the gentlemen interested represents that they make special contracts with the railroad, not with the express companies, as I understand it——

Mr. FASSETT. That was for the New York World?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Extra issues.

Mr. FASSETT. They make contracts with the railroad, not the express companies.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The contracts are made directly with the railroads, and for carloads or large weights. Now, a cent a pound is $20 a ton, which is a high rate for that kind of business.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not know how it is. I am not a member of the gentleman's committee and have not been present at the hearing. These are only statements that I gather from the newspapers. It is stated that express charges are about half the post-office charge on the same papers, carried over the same road on the same train, the only difference being that one is an express car and the other is a mail car.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Take up that statement and let us see what it means. It just illustrates what I was trying to state awhile ago, that these things are made up on averages. A car is down here at the Union Depot, for instance, going to New York. There is a quantity of newspapers to go. They are packed tightly, and they make heavy packages, which go at a low rate. There is a quantity of magazines to go. I have no doubt they go at a cent a pound. Then comes a box of dry goods at a very much higher rate. Then comes a package of millinery at a very much higher rate; so that when that carload of stuff is made up the average price on it is many per cent of what they charge for hauling the mail.

[The time of Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey having expired, Mr. WEEKS yielded to him five minutes more.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, unaware until recently that this turmoil was to be raised, or that there was to be a comparison between our system and other systems, or that we were to be asked to locate specifically the sources of our deficit as compared with the Canadian system, nobody had notice enough to give necessary time to the foreign reports, which are much more blind than ours, and deduce from them an accurate conclusion, to which the House would be fairly entitled if accurate information were necessary. But I have found enough, as I think, to satisfy us that while it may not be all that it ought to be, we have the best administered postal service extant. We have individual officials, if we can judge by their reports, who know more about the details of the service than the individuals who make the reports found in the pamphlets of other governments. Nevertheless I would like to see this postal service reorganized in a sense.

I have no doubt that we are making millions annually on first-class matter which we are dissipating on other matter. Whether anybody thinks of raising the rates on any class of matter is not in the question at this time; but we ought to know where the profits that we make on some matter are being expended; because, as I said in the beginning, sooner or later, and the time is not so far ahead, that question must be met. If at the end of three decades the increase shall have been as rapid as it has been in the last three the deficit of $17,000,000 will have grown to $100,000,000, and a deficit of $100,000,000 will be a vital matter. Gentlemen say that if there is going to be a change in the rates there must be a time for interests to be adjusted to it. I am not here this afternoon asking for a change of rates, but I do want the investigations to go on until a substantial agreement can be reached as to just where the earned millions are dissipated, so that when the matter becomes serious and we are compelled to take notice of it we will not have to proceed to the discovery of just where the difficulty lies while the deficit is growing. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] forty minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman—

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

Thus spoke the representatives of the Democratic voters of the United States in the convention at Denver, Colo., in 1908, when they gave to the country as the exponent of their faith the national Democratic platform.

Shall the Representatives in Congress holding allegiance to the Democratic party keep the faith and redeem the pledge? If so, how can the upbuilding of the American merchant marine be accomplished without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury? Let us follow in the footsteps of the fathers of our party and we will find the way.

A convention called at Annapolis shortly after the close of the Revolutionary war for the purpose of devising ways and means by which the colonies could protect the commerce and shipping interest of the newborn Republic was the first move toward the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and from this convention ultimately sprung the constitutional convention that gave to our country the greatest written constitution ever conceived by man for the organization of free governments, so that it can be justly said that the encouragement of American shipping and American commerce was one of the foundation stones of our Republic.

No question outranked in importance the fostering care of our commerce in the first Congresses of the United States. The building of American ships and the development of our foreign commerce for years has been discussed from many and varied standpoints. When we consider the building up of the American merchant marine we naturally ask the question, Is it worth while, and if it is worth while, what are the benefits to be obtained? Almost before the dawn of civilization nations were fighting for trade, and it has always been recognized that a favorable balance of trade was a vital factor in the commercial life of nations to be contended for by all. A country may maintain the balance of commerce in its favor by its export of commodities produced at home, either agricultural or manufacturing; or it may maintain a balance in its favor by reason of the work done by it for other nations. England, Norway, Germany, and France are great carriers of commerce for others than themselves. They annually have an adverse balance of trade against them amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, but as great as this adverse balance of trade is, they easily pay it by carrying in their ships the products of other nations. Without their earnings from their ships they could not for any length of time continue their present excessive importation of commodities from other lands.

Transportation must be balanced as well as trade, either by trade, by transportation, or by the exchange of precious metals, securities or investments. It has been recognized universally that a country that settles its balance of commerce in gold must ultimately become a decadent nation, poorer and poorer as the years go by.

Our early statesmen, recognizing this fact, contended for fair commerce between the colonies and foreign nations. Benjamin Franklin stated:

> Fair commerce is where equal values are exchanged for equal, the expenses of transportation included. Thus, if it cost A in England as much labor and charge to raise a bushel of wheat as it cost B in France to produce 4 gallons of wine, then are 4 gallons of wine the fair exchange for a bushel of wheat, A and B meeting at half distance with their commodities to make the exchange. The advantage of this commerce is that each party increases the number of his enjoyments, having instead of wheat alone and wine alone the use of both wheat and wine.

The balance of commerce in its trade relations with other countries is largely the determining factor in the life of a nation, that ascertains whether it shall be rich or poor, weak or strong, dependent or independent. Shipless trading nations are constantly in foreign debt and often in financial straits.

The preponderance of exports over imports may fix the balance of trade in a nation's favor; nevertheless, if some other nation is carrying its commerce, the cost of transportation being paid to the foreigner, the balance of commerce often is left in favor of the foreign nation and must be paid in gold or its equivalent. Let us not forget that commerce consists of transportation as well as trade. The freight charge becomes a part of the value of the cargo; whether it is credited to the side of the imports or the exports depends on whether the ship is foreign or domestic. Our own ships carrying goods abroad increases our credit there; our own ships bringing goods home saves in debt here. It is of equal importance that the charge for transportation should be equally balanced as that the trade balance should be in our favor. Where two countries do an equal amount of the carrying trade between them, a balancing of the imports and exports may show the debtor and creditor side of their trade condition, but where one is doing a preponderance of the transportation, that must be taken into the reckoning before a true balance of the account can be ascertained.

This is illustrated from the history of our own commercial transactions. The first favorable balance of commerce, of 66 cents per capita, occurred in 1793, four years after the inauguration of the Government. Our trade balances, as shown by the imports and exports, were adverse to the extent of $1.18 per capita, but transportation being in our favor to the extent of $1.84 per capita, left us on the credit side of the national ledger. The first favorable balance of trade, that is of imports and exports, did not happen until 1811, and was largely induced by conditions growing out of the threatened war with England, but up to that time the balance of commerce had been largely in our favor, due to the earnings of our ships in the carrying trade. The greatest excess of transportation per capita that our country has ever experienced was in 1807, when it amounted to $6.90 per capita. That year our exports were $16.25 per capita and our imports $20.78 per capita, which left a balance of trade against us, but our earnings on the sea converted an adverse balance of trade to a favorable balance of commerce to the extent of $2.37 per capita. For the first half century of our Government our shipping interest by its earnings secured for us a balance of commerce in our favor, but after the decline of the American shipping interest had once begun we have had a balance of commerce against us with very rare exceptions, notwithstanding the fact that in many years the balance of trade has been favorable, by reason of the exports being in excess of our imports.

From 1862 to 1896 we had 25 favorable balances of trade, but 9 of these were converted to adverse balances after paying our transportation charges, reducing our favorable balances of commerce to 16, as against 28 for foreign benefit, in spite of ample exports and a high protective tariff that restricted importations as far as possible. These adverse balances were largely paid in bullion. I find in the statistics of the movement in gold and silver coin and bullion for thirty-three years prior to 1896 that there was a net export of precious metals to the amount of $1,366,755,000 toward the payment of our adverse balances, a dangerous condition for even the strongest and wealthiest of nations to continue in, and yet during all these years that the Republican party has controlled the Government absolutely nothing has been done to correct the evil of shipping our basic money abroad, to discharge adverse balances of transportation recurring from year to year, caused by the absence of an adequate merchant marine.

The importance of a merchant marine to our country was clearly expressed by Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State under George Washington in 1791, when he said that "the marketing of our products will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and our politics may be influenced by those who command our commerce." This statement, made nearly one hundred and twenty years ago, is prophetic of our present condition. Foreign governments are almost exclusively possessed of our foreign carrying trade, and, to a large extent, the arrangement of their shipping routes has excluded our commerce from the markets of South America and will continue to do so as long as present conditions remain.

Since the civil war the Republican party has had either absolute or partial control of the Government, except for two years during the first half of the second Cleveland administration. In this period of nearly sixty years nothing has been done toward building up our carrying trade or restoring it to the position it occupied in the first half century after the organization of the Government. In 1860 our carriage in American vessels of imports amounted to 60 per cent and of exports to 72 per cent, or an average of 66 per cent of American commerce carried in American ships; to-day the American commerce carried in American ships averages about 9 per cent. During the life of the Republican party it has placed on the statute books what is known as the act of March 3, 1891, which provides for a mail-contract subsidy, providing bounties for certain ships carrying the mail of the United States. As our shipping has decreased to a very large extent since the passage of this act, this fact has demonstrated that the act was not an effective remedy for existing evils. It has also enacted into law a pretended discriminating tariff against foreign ships, which under its terms became inoperative at once. All the legislation it has ever passed has been ineffective and barren of results, so far as our merchant marine and foreign commerce is concerned.

The Republican party now again proposes a mail-contract subsidy to relieve the situation, but this proposition is sure to be as ineffective and barren of results as the law passed in 1891. A few million dollars paid by way of subsidy to favored ships can not possibly build up an American merchant marine or change the channels of commerce along the lines most beneficial to the American export trade.

Senator Hanna, of Ohio, realizing that if bounties were paid American ships to carry American commerce they must be large enough to become effective, introduced and advocated for the Republican party a ship-subsidy proposition at the beginning of this century. The bill was known as the "Hanna-Payne bill," and provided that the compensation paid to American ships should be as follows:

1. Upon gross tonnage.
2. For mileage sailed both outward and homeward bound.
3. To all vessels engaged in trade between our own and foreign countries.
4. According to speed, the rate per ton to certain vessels with ability to speed over 14 knots was increased proportionately.

It was claimed by the advocates of this bill that the terms of the bill were as low as feasible, if success might be hoped for. Sailing vessels of less speed than 14 knots were to be compensated at the lowest rate, namely:

> One and one-half cents per each gross ton for each 100 miles for the first 1,500 miles sailed, both outward and homeward bound, and 1 cent per gross ton for each 100 miles over 1,500 miles sailed, both outward and homeward bound.

Additional rates were payable to certain steamers that could sail faster than 14 knots an hour. It was computed that the average voyage in our foreign trade is about 3,756 miles, and that for the average ship the compensation would amount to 82.62 cents per ton for its gross tonnage. It was further estimated that for the year 1900 the inward and the outward movement of the foreign trade of the United States in vessels would be about 48,751,333 tons. Under these circumstances, if American commerce had all been carried in American ships, the subsidy for that year to be paid out of the Treasury would have amounted to over $40,000,000, and with the increased commerce in the last ten years, if the bill had passed and been placed on the statute books, the amount paid out of the Federal Treasury up to date would have amounted to more than one-half of the national debt of the United States. These figures so alarmed the proponents of the bill that they ultimately limited the amount that could be expended under its terms to $9,000,000 a year, but this proposition, of course, was illogical; $9,000,000 a year would only have carried one-fourth or one-fifth of our foreign commerce, one-half would have been paid to ships already in commission engaged in the foreign carrying trade, and the total increase under the terms of the bill of American ships in the foreign carrying trade would have been only one-tenth of the whole.

If it were a good thing to pay $9,000,000 to increase our carrying trade one-tenth, the logic of the argument would carry us to the conclusion that it would have been a good thing to have paid sufficient subsidy to enable American ships to carry our entire commerce. The amount of the bounty to be paid out of the Federal Treasury, and the fact that the bill was more in the interest of shipbuilders than of foreign commerce, as under its terms a ship would receive its bounty for each voyage whether it carried a cargo or not, demonstrated so conclusively the ineffectiveness of the bill that the Republican party could not be united in favor of it, so it fell of its own weight.

Surely if it would have taken $40,000,000 under a system of bounties and subsidies to restore the American ships to the control of our foreign carrying trade in 1900, a mail-subsidy contract providing for an appropriation of a few millions could not possibly be effective at this time, and the only result of the passage of such a bill would be to pay an additional subsidy to ships already in commission, without increasing our present fleet to an appreciable extent.

The greatest objection to this form of legislation is that when you make a direct appropriation from the taxes gathered from the people to build up special interests, there is no defining where the line will ultimately be drawn; for if we can tax the people to subsidize one man's business, we can tax them to pay tribute to another. It is a most dangerous proposition to contend for. The Constitution of the United States contemplated the raising of taxes for specific governmental purposes, such as the maintenance of the courts and the building of the navy, but clearly did not contemplate, within the limited powers granted by the States to the Federal Government, the right to subsidize special interests out of the Federal Treasury.

This proposition was stated very clearly by James Madison in a speech in Congress on a bill to grant bounties to deep-sea fisheries. Mr. Madison said:

> Several arguments have been advanced to show that because, in the regulation of trade, indirect and eventual encouragement is given to manufactures, therefore Congress has power to give money in direct bounties or to grant it in any other way that would answer the same purpose. But surely, sir, there is a great and obvious difference, which it can not be necessary to enlarge upon.
> A duty laid on imported implements of husbandry would, in its operation, be an indirect tax on exported produce; but will any one say that, by virtue of a mere power to lay duties on imports, Congress may go directly to the produce or implements of agriculture or to the articles imported?
> It is true duties on exports are expressly prohibited; but if there were no article forbidding them, a power directly to tax exports could never be deduced from a power to tax imports, although such power might directly and incidentally affect exports.
> In short, sir, without going further into the subject, which I should not have here touched on at all but for the reasons already mentioned, I venture to declare it as my opinion that were the power of Congress to be established in the latitude contended for, it would subvert the very foundation and transmute the very nature of the limited government by the people of America; and what inferences might be drawn and what consequences ensue from such a step, it is incumbent on us all well to consider.

In other words, an indirect benefit may arise to special interests by reason of the power to levy taxes, such as the incidental protection that may come from levying a duty on foreign imports coming into this country; but the fact that Congress is authorized to levy taxes, and that thereby some special interests derive a benefit from levying these taxes, does not by any means authorize the collection of taxes and the paying of the money collected out to special interests, no matter how worthy the purpose of the appropriation may be.

Many of the men who were members of the Constitutional Convention were Members of the first Congresses of the United States. These Congresses were greatly interested in the development and building up of our merchant marine and the control of our foreign trade. No men understood better the limitations of the powers of Congress than the men who served in the Senate and the House of Representatives in the early history of our Government, and it is interesting to note the policy they pursued and the course they followed to produce the desired results. The first bill enacted by the Congress after it assembled was the tariff act of July 4, 1789. Section 5 of that act reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that a discount of 10 per cent on all the duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandises as shall be imported in vessels built in the United States and which shall be wholly the property of a citizen or citizens thereof, or in vessels built in foreign countries, and on the 16th day of May last wholly the property of a citizen of the United States, and so continuing until the time of importation.

From this it will be seen that a discriminating duty by way of discount of 10 per cent was given on all goods imported into the United States in American ships owned by American citizens. James Madison, the father of the Constitution of the United States, was in charge of the bill, and the logic and force of his great intellect was in favor of the adoption of the discriminating duty in favor of American ships.

A few years later the tariff act of August 10, 1790, was passed, and section 2 of this act reads as follows:

> SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, that an addition of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise which after the said last day of December next shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, except in the cases in which an additional duty is hereinbefore specially laid on any goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in such ships or vessels.

From this law it will be seen that the discriminating duty was still continued in force, but was changed from a discount of 10 per cent on goods coming in American vessels to an additional duty of 10 per cent on goods imported in foreign vessels.

These discriminating tariff duties were again enacted in the act of June 7, 1794, and again in the tariff act of January 29, 1795, and again in the tariff act of May 11, 1800. The tariff act of March 12, 1804, section 3, reads as follows:

> SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That an addition of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all such goods, wares, and merchandise as aforesaid as shall, after the said 30th day of June, be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States.

It is worthy of note that this bill was passed in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, was signed by him when it became a law, and carried his approval of a discriminating duty of an additional 10 per cent levied on all goods imported into this country in foreign ships for the purpose of upbuilding the American merchant marine.

Practically the same law was reenacted in the tariff act of July 1, 1812, and again reenacted in the tariff act of February 25, 1813, when James Madison was President of the United States, and received his approval, as did the first discriminating duty passed by the First Congress. These discriminating duties in favor of the American ship and the upbuilding of our foreign commerce were advocated, proposed, and enacted into law by the founders of the Democratic party. Our statesmen advocated the enactment of this legislation both as a matter of principle and as a good business and governmental policy. The wisdom of their laws was demonstrated by the results obtained. Such was the purpose and good effect of these acts of Congress that from 1789 to 1794, a period of seven years, the carrying of foreign imports in American ships rose from about 17 per cent to 94 per cent, and the exports of all American goods in American ships during that same period rose from about 30 per cent to 90 per cent, until the war of 1812, when it fell to an average of 55 per cent, but fully recovered in six years and culminated at an average of 92½ per cent in 1826.

At this time a suspension of the discriminating duties in favor of the American ships was recommended by the President, and in 1828 an act for this purpose was passed, which I will now read:

> That upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied in the ports of said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufacture, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are and shall be suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said foreign nation and the produce, manufactures, and merchandise imported into the United States in the same from the said foreign nation or from any other country, the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States and their cargoes as aforesaid shall be continued, and no longer.

The new policy was admitted as experimental, but it was contended that if it should not work as expected and a loss of carrying trade should follow, then Congress could repeal the conventions made under its terms and reinstate the old system. The passage of the bill proved the undoing of the merchant marine, and the policy it inaugurated has never been changed.

Shipping nations were not honest enough between themselves for the application of free-trade principles in navigation, and most of our rivals while professing to practice a policy of non-discrimination against American ships, acted unfairly and resorted to some form of ship protection, either by granting subsidies or bounties or by adopting other methods of discrimination against American ships.

Great Britain did not avail itself of the benefits of the law of 1828 until 1850, and in twelve years thereafter we had lost 21 per cent of our carrying trade. This brought us up to the period of the civil war, and shows conclusively that it was not war conditions alone that destroyed our merchant marine, but the change of policy on the part of our Government had commenced its destruction before the war period was reached. Under these circumstances it seems clear to me that the constitutional and effective way to restore the American ships to the seas and carry American commerce in American bottoms is to return to the policy of the fathers and for the Congress to adopt again a discriminating duty in favor of American ships.

A reduction of the tariff of 5 per cent on all goods imported into the United States in American ships would give the American shipowner an advantage over the foreign shipowner in payment of duties of from ten to fifteen millions of dollars annually. This would not fall as a burden on anyone; it, of course, would enable the American shipowner to charge nearly the amount of the discriminating duty as additional freight rates, but it would not increase the cost of goods imported in this country a dollar over what they are to-day. It would not take a dollar out of the Federal Treasury, and, in my judgment, it is the only effective remedy that can be adopted toward building up the merchant marine of our country, and keep the profits that are derived from the transportation of our foreign commerce at home instead of paying it to foreign nations. The only objection that I have heard urged to this policy has been that it would be in violation of our foreign treaties, and that we could not afford to endanger our trade relations with foreign countries in this way.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet that has been issued by William W. Bates, president of the Shipping Association of America, and at one time Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, then a bureau in the Treasury Department, but now in the Department of Commerce and Labor. There is no man in America better advised and informed on these questions than Mr. Bates, and I read you what he says as to how far conventions made under the act of 1828 are effective and control our actions to-day:

> It is supposed by some who are friends of our marine, and others who are not, that certain conventions, which some term treaties and others think are commercial covenants, stand in the way of reviving our early policy of trade regulations. They take it that our early policy was abandoned, and that foreign nations have acquired the rights that we relinquished. These notions are mistaken. The "conventions" were made for nothing else than the mutual suspension of ship protection, then generally secured by trade regulations. In making these agreements our early policy was not abandoned, only temporarily and conditionally "suspended" (that is the word in the act) as to such nations as would reciprocate for a term of years—generally ten. With respect to other nations, our primal policy is in full force to-day. Only twenty-two nations are now excepted from our regulations as they stood in 1828. Several nations—such as Brazil, Peru, Nicaragua, and Venezuela—have terminated their conventions with us, without at all disturbing their trade relations. We had a commercial convention with England (1854–1864) for trade reciprocity with Canada, which we terminated in 1865 without injuring our trade relations in the least.
> We relinquished no rights whatever by granting a privilege for a term of years. On the contrary it may be contended that our rights on the sea, and to the regulation of our trade, were confirmed by every nation that made a convention with us—for a privilege to bring to our ports ships and cargoes from their own and other countries free of discriminating duties. The conventions merely made exceptions to our permanent law. The right to terminate the conventions, after the expiration of the term fixed, was reserved by stipulation to each party, and the exercise of this right can not be questioned by either party, nor can other parties offer valid objections.
> However, there are some to whom these facts should be common knowledge, who ask whether the termination of our "maritime reciprocity conventions" (not treaties) "would not mean the tearing up of our trade relations with the rest of the world?" The answer is, most decidedly, "No!" Trade relations are not at all concerned. Our trade relations were established with foreign nations long before any of these "conventions" were made. They are like a coverlet to a bed—that may be left on or laid off.
> We have a just cause of action against these conventions. Under them, and owing to them, our foreign carrying trade has been lost. Other nations have gained it from us. Doubtless they believe in them, because our hands are tied from using against them the only protection possible under our Constitution; but why any American feels like longer tolerating them seems strange indeed. With the conventions terminated the argument for the safety of trade relations would vanish, since it has no more weight than a summer cloud.
> Besides, in point of fact, our rivals have paid no attention to the spirit and true object of these conventions—the doing without ship protection. On the contrary, all of them have resorted to protective devices of some sort. Devices such as some substitute for trade regulations are impossible of application in the United States. The truth is that our foreign carrying trade needs more protection than that of any foreign nation, and Congress must be perfectly free to make it into law; to provide a defense against the advantages and adverse devices of foreign nations, and to secure in perpetuity for our commerce the services of an adequate American marine.
> These conventions, save one, with two years remaining, have long since run out their time. They were based on "reciprocity," but we have now no ships, and reciprocity has vanished. No longer is there a pretense of equity or usefulness in them. While they continue there seems to be the shadow of an excuse for calling on Congress for "ship subsidy"—as compensation for their injurious action.
> Some have advanced the idea that termination of these conventions would cause retaliation of some sort. That would be unjustifiable. It would be very uncivil treatment, a manifestation of malice, a breach of the peace. It would challenge our freedom, our courage, and our pride. It would mean war, with its "horrid front." It would mean a merchant marine with the return of peace—unless the Republic shall go down in defeat. We are a free Nation, and it is known that we can and will defend our rights, our honor, and our national life. The idea of "retaliation" because we act within our rights to regain our place on the sea—what is it? Nothing but a foolish appeal to cowardice. There will be no "retaliation" until the nations have lost their senses. Tell the world that we, Americans, dare not by proper legislation recover our lost place as a shipping nation if you will, but there is no brave nation governed by rulers so simple as to believe it. Only the fearful among the politicians of our own Nation would be such simpletons.

As stated by Mr. Bates, it is clear that there are no treaties that stand in our way to prevent us from enacting a discriminating tariff duty in favor of American ships. It was the policy of the fathers; it built up our merchant marine from a point where it was carrying 17 per cent of our commerce to a point where it was carrying 90 per cent of American commerce in a period of seven years. It does not place additional burdens on the people; it is not a policy of doubtful constitutionality; it is a policy that has been tried and proven effective. It is a policy by which we can restore the American flag to the seas and the American ships to our commercial trade. It is a policy that will enable us to build up the export trade of the American people. It is a policy that will enable us to find foreign markets for our surplus products in agriculture and manufacture. It is a policy that will restore the balance of commerce as well as trade to our Nation. It is a policy that will ultimately overcome the necessity of our paying a foreign balance in gold to European nations and will bring prosperity to all lines of industry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOU VELLE].

Mr. TOU VELLE. Mr. Chairman, in the second session of the Sixtieth Congress I introduced H. R. 28071, to prohibit the Post-Office Department from printing certain matter on stamped envelopes. Said bill was reintroduced in the first session of the Sixty-first Congress as H. R. 3075, and is as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for the Post-Office Department, or any officer, head of bureau, or chief of division thereof, to print or have printed, or sell or offer to sell, any stamped envelope bearing upon it a printed direction giving the name of any individual, firm, or company, or any number of any post-office box or drawer, or any street number, or the name of any building to which it shall be returned if uncalled for or undelivered: Provided, That this shall not apply to those envelopes printed with a return card left blank, as to name, address, box, drawer, street number, or building, and which only give the name of the town or city, with the State, District, or Territory.

As reported by the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads February 18, 1910 (Report No. 498), the substance of this bill appears as a proviso in the annual appropriation bill. The same language is used, except that instead of taking effect "from and after approval," it is to be in force "from and after June 30, 1911," in order not to interfere with the existing contract with the manufacturer of stamped envelopes.

The Government has printed special-request envelopes since 1865. They are not printed in government printing offices, as is sometimes assumed, but by the corporation that manufactures stamped envelopes.

No profit is to be derived by the Government. The Statutes of the United States, Supplement 1, page 110, section 114, provide that—

> No stamped envelopes or newspaper wrappers shall be sold by the Post-Office Department at less—in addition to the regular postage—than the cost, including all salaries, clerk hire, and other expenses connected therewith.

This provision is construed by the Postmaster-General, in an official statement, to require that—> stamped envelopes be sold at cost of manufacture and distribution in addition to the postage value.

This is the manifest intent and purpose of the law.

It is claimed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], in his speech delivered on the 21st instant, that on envelopes of a certain size the Government loses 22 cents per thousand on each 1,000 distributed, in addition to the cost of the clerical work required to handle this business.

The Third Assistant Postmaster-General, in his annual report for the year ending June 30, 1909, makes the following statement:

> Of the 1,509,626,246 stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers issued in the fiscal year 1909, 1,027,474,889, or 68.06 per cent, were return-card "special-request" envelopes.

If there is only a slight loss on every thousand of these special-request envelopes, which are purchased in lots of 500 or more, the aggregate would be very great. The Government, under the present law, can not receive a profit arising from the sale of these envelopes, so that a claim of financial advantage can not be urged in support of the continuance of the system.

The arguments made to sustain the practice which this bill seeks to remedy, though undoubtedly urged in good faith, can be, I believe, successfully controverted. Let us first disabuse our minds of any misapprehension as to the scope and purpose of this bill.

No attack is made on the government stamped envelope. The utility of this device is acknowledged; its convenience to the people as well as its value in the mail service is freely admitted. There is no section or line in the bill which in any manner interferes with the production and distribution of the plain stamped envelope commonly used.

No attack is made on the general principle involved in the return request. The proviso of the proposed bill specifically enacts that—

> This shall not apply to those envelopes printed with a return card left blank as to name, address, box, drawer, street number, or building, and which gives only the name of the town or city, with the State, district, or Territory.

The request for a return is a good thing, either written or printed.

We therefore recognize the fact not only that the stamped envelope is a necessary convenience and that its manufacture and sale must be controlled by the Post-Office Department, but we also realize that in many cases the printing of the blank corner card, specifically permitted by the proposed bill, is a convenience to the smaller user and of a sufficient advantage to the postal service to justify the manufacture and sale of envelopes so printed under public auspices. We deny, however, that there is any justification, either in principle or in policy, for the Post-Office Department to continue in competition with our local newspapers by offering to print without charge individual corner cards on stamped envelopes in quantities of 500 or upward.

The fact that the department, in the performance of its prescribed functions, enters into competition with other private enterprises furnishes no argument tending to establish the justice of its encroachment on private rights and privileges in this case.

When this practice of printing return requests without charge was inaugurated forty-five years ago, there may have been sufficient reason for it. The mail system was in its infancy, with only a fraction of the volume of business that it now enjoys; the methods of transportation, distribution, and delivery were crude; the public had very little conception of a rapid and efficient service; scarcely anybody took the trouble to write or print a request for the letter, if undelivered, to be returned to the writer; and the work of the Dead-Letter Office was undoubtedly swollen through the lack of this system.

But the system has now endured for forty-five years. The habit of using printed requests, whether furnished by the Government or private persons, has become well-nigh universal in business circles and would continue if the Government ceased to furnish them.

The private correspondence of the occasional letter writer, which furnishes almost the whole of the mail that goes to the Dead-Letter Office, is not now reached by this practice of which we complain, and will never be reached by it. They will never purchase stamped envelopes in lots of 500. If they use stamped envelopes with return cards, they purchase, and will continue to purchase, them at the post-offices, paying for them at the rate of $10, $5, and so forth, per thousand—in addition to the value of stamps—according to the number purchased.

The contention that the withdrawal of this free individual corner card-return privilege would fall most heavily upon the farmers, millers, creameries, lumbering firms, and other rural concerns is without force. It would be difficult to conceive of a farmer, or an industry of any of the classes mentioned, doing business enough to warrant the purchase of 500 stamped envelopes in one order so remote from a printing office as to experience inconvenience in placing an order for such envelopes as he needed.

The strongest argument offered by those who advocate the extension of government functions to compete with private enterprises is based on the claim that it is sometimes necessary to do this to break up a monopoly; but this practice by the Government of furnishing envelopes with a special individual request printed thereon free of charge to the purchaser has a direct adverse effect. It builds up a monopoly in the form of a government contractor with a plant so extensive that no one can bid against him on equal terms. It is true that the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder, but since the inauguration of the stamped envelope in 1865 it is understood that only two corporations have ever held the contract.

The present system destroys individual competition by the private printers, who would otherwise bid against each other to furnish the consumer with printed envelopes. This competition would guarantee the public against exorbitant charges, and at the same time furnish employment to citizens in towns and villages.

The country editors of the Nation perform in the aggregate more gratuitous public service and, when their power is concentrated, exert more beneficent and patriotic influence than all other classes of journals.

> Trade hardly deems the busy day begun
> Till his keen eye along the sheet has run;
> The blooming daughter throws her needle by
> And reads her schoolmate's marriage with a sigh;
> While the grave mother puts her glasses on
> And gives a tear to some old crony gone.
> The preacher, too, his Sunday theme lays down,
> To know what last new folly fills the town.

Yet the country newspapers, these recorders of local history, receive but a fraction of the compensation they richly earn. They submit patiently to varied forms of competition. City printers canvass for all the profitable jobs of the local business men—men whom the editors unselfishly serve; rural free delivery carries to their farmer subscribers the cheap city daily at nominal postage rates.

They are surrounded by many disheartening conditions, which are endured without murmur or complaint; but when the Government offers and furnishes free printing on stamped envelopes, which unnecessarily deprives them of a legitimate source of revenue, and when the Government by this practice derives no benefit, either financially or otherwise, they most respectfully, but emphatically, object.

We suggest to other workers and business men the reflection as to how they would feel if the Government unnecessarily introduced competition with them and supplied consumers with their goods at cost or less than cost. If the Government were a direct competitor of the manufacturers and dealers in other lines, selling to their consumer at cost or less than cost and using the mails without postage to take away their customers, with every postmaster an agent for this destructive competition, would these gentlemen submit to such an invasion of their private enterprise without making an effort, at least, to get relief?

The country editors are justified in asking help of other industries for two reasons: First, because they should be glad to assist fellow business men when suffering from injustice, and, second, because if this unnecessary tendency toward paternalism continues all forms of industrial enterprise may become involved.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that every Member of this House wants the newspapers in his district to have the right to compete for this business, and, so believing, ask their unanimous support for this change in the postal laws.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOU VELLE. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that on the return blank they print the name of a corporation?

Mr. TOU VELLE. I think they can.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can they give the business of the private individual?

Mr. TOU VELLE. I do not think they can.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, if they allow in this return the line of business of the individual to be stated?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand the return is limited to the request for the return, the name of the person, the street, town, and State.

Mr. TOU VELLE. But they can say it is a corporation—a bank, for instance.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not sure about that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I agree with the contention of the gentleman from Ohio. If it is permissible to advertise the man's business, under the practice, I think it is a reprehensible practice. I have been informed that the return cards can be printed in that way.

Mr. TOU VELLE. I do not think they give the business of the individual.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But to put the name of the corporation on the return card advertises the corporation at that point.

Mr. TOU VELLE. It is my opinion that no one is permitted to put anything on the special-request envelope in the nature of an advertisement that will show the nature of the business unless the words showing the nature of the business or advertisement be part of the incorporate name. Under this exception every corporation can advertise its business at government expense, as "Return to First National Bank, Third and Crown streets, Oswego, N. Y.;" "Return to the International Harvester Company," and so forth. These, I think, are advertisements and can be printed on special-request envelopes at government expense.

An individual can not have printed the "Return to Henry Johnson, merchant," or "John Smith, butcher."

I think this covers the question raised by the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and Mr. BENNET of New York having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WOODYARD, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the dismissal by the court in the case of John H. Jackson against The United States (H. Doc. No. 727)—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rochester, Easton, and Heuvelton, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the appointment of United States surgeons, immigrant inspectors, and matrons on vessels carrying immigrant passengers between ths United States and foreign ports, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cambridge, Trumansburg, Brooklyn, South Glens Falls, Gloversville, and Fair Haven, all of the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Hawaii, which were referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

He also presented a petition of the United Spanish War Veterans, Department of New York, of Oswego, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the removal of the wreck of the battle ship Maine and the proper interment of the remains of those who perished therein, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York City and Wellsville, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the board of managers of the Produce Exchange of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the transfer of the publication of pilot charts from the United States Hydrographic Office to the Weather Bureau, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Troy, Newburgh, Brooklyn, New York City, Rochester, and Albany, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the retention of the publicity clause in the corporation-tax law, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a petition of representative citizens of Oregon, including the governor and state officials, praying for the passage of the bill for the relief of Siletz Indian Reservation settlers. The petition is short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD with the signatures, as follows:

SALEM, OREG., February 19, 1910.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We the undersigned citizens of the State of Oregon, respectfully petition that the bill for the relief of Siletz settlers, introduced by Senator CHAMBERLAIN January 24, 1910, and by Congressman HAWLEY January 17, 1910, be speedily enacted into law, believing that justice demands the passage of such a law, and further believing that its provisions could not possibly harm or injure any right or rights to which any other person or persons are entitled.

Respectfully submitted,

F. W. Benson, governor; G. A. Steel, state treasurer; C. N. B. Arthur, speaker of the house; G. G. Brown, clerk state land board; Chas. V. Galloway, state tax commissioner; J. B. Eaton, state tax commissioner; Oswald West, railroad commissioner; Thos. K. Campbell, railroad commissioner; John H. Lewis, state engineer; Percy A. Cupper, assistant state engineer; S. A. Kozer, insurance commissioner; R. E. Lee Steiner, superintendent O. S. I. A.; C. W. James, superintendent O. S. P.; Al. H. Crawford, attorney-general; J. C. Woodward, clerk supreme court, Salem, Oreg.; W. S. Duniway, state printer; R. J. Hendricks, manager Statesman, United States census supervisor; W. M. Bushey, county judge, Marion County; H. P. Minto, sheriff Marion County; R. D. Allen, county clerk, Marion County, Oreg.; D. G. Drager, county recorder, Marion County; J. G. Moore, county treasurer, Marion County; F. J. Rice, county assessor, Marion County. W. M. Smith, county school superintendent, Marion County; Geo. F. Rodgers, mayor of Salem, Oreg.; W. A. Moores, city recorder of Salem, Oreg.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3806) to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 293) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5785) to amend an act entitled "An act to allow the Minneapolis, Red Lake and Manitoba Railway Company to acquire certain lands in the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.," approved February 8, 1905, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 294) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5786) to amend fifth paragraph of section 4 of act approved June 28, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 539), reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 295) thereon.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4982) to establish a United States court of patent appeals, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 296) thereon.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2209) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Trenton, in the State of Missouri, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 297) thereon.

SIGNING OF WARRANTS.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18586) amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 246 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows: "The Secretary of the Treasury may, by an appointment under his hand and official seal, delegate authority to the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury to sign in his stead, and he may in like manner delegate such authority to a clerk in his office to sign in his name, all warrants for the payment of money into the Public Treasury and all warrants for the disbursement from the Public Treasury of money certified by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to be due upon accounts duly audited and settled by them; also all accountable warrants placing money in the Treasury to the credit of disbursing and other fiscal officers, and all appropriations, repay, and transfer warrants. The warrants so signed by either of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury or by the designated clerk shall be in all cases of the same validity as if they had been signed by the Secretary of the Treasury himself."

SEC. 2. That section 247 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indicate why it is necessary to designate a clerk? I can see why it is necessary to designate assistant secretaries.

Mr. LODGE. That is the present law; the assistant secretaries have the right now to sign. The only addition is to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to designate a clerk to sign warrants. The comptroller has that authority now, and the Treasurer of the United States. It is utterly impossible for the secretaries to attend to it. There are a million warrants. The signing is a mere formal act.

This is a House bill. The committee examined it with great care and have come to the conclusion that it is a perfectly proper bill in every respect. It is simply to give the Secretary of the Treasury the same privilege that the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Currency have now.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. DU PONT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4446) to give the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power in regard to the improvement of the post-office and court-house at Wilmington, Del., to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 292) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of section 2 of the act of May 30, 1908, for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of the post-office and court-house at Wilmington, Del., the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire additional land as authorized by the act of March 4, 1909, or, in his discretion, in lieu of the acquisition of additional land, to construct a fire wall along the rear line of the site of the building and to disregard the provisions of existing legislation requiring the preservation of a fire limit of 40 feet on all sides of the building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES COODY.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate resolution 187, submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on the 25th instant, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Senate resolution 187.

Resolved, That whereas on February 5, 1908, S. 5015 was introduced and referred to the Committee on Claims, and subsequently said committee referred said bill to the Court of Claims embodied in Senate resolution No. 197, May 22, 1908. The name as it appears in said bill and resolution as Charles Goody should have been Charles Coody, and the Court of Claims is hereby authorized to make this correction in the spelling of the name.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Should it not be a joint resolution? It is reported as a simple Senate resolution. Would it not require the concurrent action of the House of Representatives?

Mr. CURTIS. The resolution referring the case to the Court of Claims was simply a Senate resolution, and therefore it is not necessary that this should be a concurrent resolution, I understand.

The resolution was agreed to.

COURT PRACTICE IN WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18019) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas" to report it favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered at this time.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would say to the Senator from Arkansas that this is a matter we now have under consideration, and we have reached a conclusion in the Committee on the Revision of the Laws along the same lines, but more comprehensively. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that until the Senate is advised as to the action proposed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws he let the bill go to the calendar, and then it can come up.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is not anything that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws can do which can touch the subject-matter of this bill. There was a special act passed a year or so ago that allowed those persons who have been confined in other divisions of the western district, willing to plead guilty, to do so at the first term of the court, regardless of the place of confinement. That has been working there. There is no provision of the general law to cover it. It is peculiar to that district. That is the only omission this proposed act is intended to cover. There was no provision made to pay the clerk's costs in such cases.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator knows, as a member of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, that we are substituting general for special provisions wherever it can be done. I am entirely familiar with the fact that this is a special provision, but when you come to make a general provision it is necessary to adapt it to general conditions. I prefer that the matter should go to the calendar.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is very true; but if a general provision shall be hereafter enacted into law covering this special question the law repealing all private privileges, this will go out with the other matters. Unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has not been given.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked if there was objection, and the Chair assumes that the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho that the bill go to the calendar is equivalent to an objection.

Hr. HEYBURN. It is equivalent to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has objected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do so in the interest of legislation. It would accomplish no good purpose, as the Senator will find, to pass the bill now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let it go to the calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

DIGEST OF SUPREME COURT DECISIONS.

Mr BURKETT, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 189), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 189.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to purchase for the use of such committees of the Senate as are supplied with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States a suitable digest of such decisions and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 to enable the Government to continue its efforts to mitigate, if not entirely stamp out, the opium evil, through a proposed international conference, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 to extend the quay wall at Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment relative to the survey of St. Josephs Bay, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $11,500 for the construction of a turning basin in the Fox River at Depere, Wis., intended to be proposed by by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,700 for improving Warroad Harbor, Minnesota, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LORIMER submitted an amendment relative to the survey of the West Branch, South Fork, Chicago River, from Robey street west to Forty-eighth avenue, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the survey of Rock River from Sterling, Ill., to Janesville, Wis., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN (for Mr. BEVERIDGE) submitted an amendment relative to the survey of a ship canal from Toledo to Chicago via Fort Wayne, Ind., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DEPEW submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,350,000 for improving the Hudson River, New York, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $99,275 for improving the harbor at Dunkirk, N. Y., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 198), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 198.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill and engrossed Senate amendments thereto (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ALONZO H. STEWART.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 190), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 190.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Alonzo H. Stewart, late assistant doorkeeper of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his resignation.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. OLIVER (by request) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 188), which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Senate resolution 188.

Whereas for fifty consecutive years, prior to 1875, the Post-Office Department was self-sustaining: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed and requested to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws in relation to the postal service of the United States as to produce an annual revenue adequate to the support of said service.

GOVERNMENT OF HAWAII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the special order, which is Senate bill 3360.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3360) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900.

Mr. DEPEW. The bill has been read through, and I believe that one amendment offered by myself has been accepted. Otherwise I think no other amendment has been adopted. Is there any amendment pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New York is pending.

Mr. DEPEW. It is pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. So the clerks advise the Chair.

Mr. DEPEW. I ask for action on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 4 the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the provisions of section 4, except the last paragraph thereof, of an act approved February 6, 1905, authorizing a guaranty of interest on railroad bonds in the Philippine Islands, is hereby extended and made applicable to the Territory of Hawaii, with the following changes: "Hawaiian" shall be substituted for "Philippine," "governor" for "governor-general," and "two hundred thousand" for "one million two hundred thousand," in said section as applied to Hawaii.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think that is a matter of sufficient importance for us to have the amendment presented in the terms in which it will be effectual in the law. Here is a reference simply to an important piece of legislation in regard to the Philippine Islands, which, I understand, goes to the extent of guaranteeing certain investments made by private individuals, and so forth, simply by reference to it and by amending it in the substitution of certain words. We have not the act before us. I think at least it ought to be read to us and let us see what it is that is to be engrafted upon the bill in the shape of this amendment. I think the amendment as it will be enforced as law ought to be stated in full.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offered an amendment, when this measure was up last Thursday, to the amendment. I supposed that my amendment to the amendment was pending. If it is not, I desire to offer it as an amendment to the amendment now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida can present his amendment. There seems to be some question whether the amendment he presented was an amendment to the amendment or to some other part of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was an amendment to the amendment, and is as follows:

Strike out in section 4, page 4, the semicolon after the word "States," in line 6 and insert a period, and strike out all of the section following.

In other words, my amendment would eliminate entirely all the section after the word "States" in line 6 on page 4, doing away with the proviso, which is objectionable in many ways, it seems to me, and I think it would meet the situation. The proviso is to the following effect:

That, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, the legislature of the Territory may provide for loans of public moneys, or guaranties of private loans, on proper security to settlers on the public lands for necessary permanent improvements of their homesteads, and for loans, subsidies, or guaranties to persons or corporations for the improvement and increase of transportation facilities.

It seems to me that is a very dangerous power to lodge in the legislature. It is safeguarded to some extent by the provision that such acts of the legislature must be approved by the President of the United States; but I submit it is a work which ought not to be placed on the President to investigate into the details which would prompt the legislature to authorize subsidies and loans of the public moneys of that kind. It seems to me that the entire proviso ought to be stricken from the bill. It does not cure it entirely by inserting a clause similar to that in the laws governing the Philippine Islands. I think, under all the conditions in that Territory, the power ought not to be vested in the legislature.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is not an amendment to that offered by the Senator from New York. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida proposes to strike from the bill certain matter which precedes that to which the Senator from New York has offered an amendment, and also to strike out what the Senator from New York proposes to insert in the bill. While the matter which the Senator from Florida presents is all right in itself, it seems to the Chair that it is not an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well, Mr. President, I will be glad to submit it after the amendment of the Senator from New York is voted on. I mention it now so as to inform the Senate of my position and my objection to the section. I will offer the amendment after the amendment of the Senator from New York is voted on. I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from New York ought not to prevail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it should prevail, of course the Senator from Florida understands that he could not immediately move to strike it out, it having just been voted in.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator from Florida will move to strike out not simply what the Senator from New York offers as an amendment, but that which it also amends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the proposition.

Mr. BACON. You can amend the section and then move to strike out the entire section, or you can amend a part of the section and then move to strike out that entire part.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can move to strike out the entire section, of course.

Mr. BACON. I presume I misunderstand the Chair or I misunderstand the Senator from Florida, one or the other. The rule that the Chair now recognizes, that after an amendment has been adopted to a section a motion to strike out the entire section is in order, will also apply to a part of a section or to a clause in a section or to a paragraph in a section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Georgia states the matter correctly.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt that the Chair and myself entirely agree upon that, and simply differ, probably, as to what the Senator from Florida seeks to accomplish. I understood the Senator from Florida to desire, after the Senator from New York had offered his amendment, and in case it should be adopted, to strike out that part of it which he had thus amended, not simply the amendment, but the contiguous part of the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Of course, the Senator from Florida can do that.

Mr. FLETCHER. My purpose is to allow the section to stand down to and including the word "States," in line 6, page 4, and to end the section there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair now understands the Senator from Florida. That is all right.

Mr. DEPEW. The Senator from Georgia asked what was the section of the Philippine act that was proposed by my amendment to be made applicable in its restrictive character to the bill as it is now before the Senate, and I ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The statute applicable to the Philippine Islands, volume 33, part 1, United States Statutes at Large, pages 690 and 691, reads:

Such contract of guaranty shall be signed on behalf of said government by the governor-general thereof and on behalf of the railroad company undertaking the construction——

Mr. BACON. I may be in error, but I understand there is nothing, so far, in the bill which guarantees any contracts, and this is a proposition to make it such.

Mr. DEPEW. There is nothing now in the law which guarantees a contract. The proposition is substantially to enact for the Territory of Hawaii the law as it now prevails in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, let me state the purpose of my interruption, which will probably save some little time. I may not have it before me, but I do not understand that, so far, there is anything in this bill which authorizes the guaranteeing of any contracts or anything of that kind.

Mr. DEPEW. The provision in the bill is for the guaranteeing of the bonds of railroads for the purpose of constructing railroads.

Mr. BACON. On what page is that?

Mr. DEPEW. It is the fourth section.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I see that. Well, Mr. President, with that information, I shall withdraw my interruption. I did not suppose that the language had the proper connection until I saw that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. No; I interrupted the reading because I supposed it had not connection at the right point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the statute.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the statute in relation to the Philippine Islands, as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of aiding in the construction, equipment, operation, and maintenance of such railroads using steam, electricity, or other power, in the Philippine Islands as the Philippine government may hereafter specifically authorize, the said government is empowered to enter into a contract of guaranty with any railroad company organized pursuant to the laws of said government or of the United States or any State thereof undertaking to construct, equip, operate, and maintain any such railroad, whereby the said government shall guarantee interest at not exceeding 4 per cent per annum upon first-lien bonds to be issued by such company, properly secured by mortgage or deed of trust upon the said railroad, its equipment, franchises, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, then owned and thereafter to be acquired.

Provided, That in no event shall the total annual contingent liability of said government under the guaranties authorized by this section at any time exceed the sum of $1,200,000, and no such guaranty shall continue for a longer period than thirty years.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest to the Senator from New York that I think this amendment ought to be written out as it will be when incorporated in the pending bill, and not simply by reference to another statute. We can not tell exactly what the relation of it is by striking out certain words and substituting others. It seems to me that it ought to be rewritten, with the words stricken out and substituted, so that we may see in a concrete form the amendment which is to be put into the bill.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will insist upon the view of this matter which he has just taken. Where the Government is to be held responsible there ought not to be anything except definitive terms governing every provision. I hope the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] will not insist upon taking legislation upon another and an entirely distinct subject, very far away in every respect, and putting it on in this way, but that he will take his bill and frame the provision, as he easily can, as he is a good lawyer, so that we may know in reading the bill just what is the extent of the Government's liability. I do not know now, the Senator from Georgia does not know now, what is the extent of the Government's liability under this method of legislation. I hope the Senator from New York will let the matter stand over and prepare an amendment that will cover every detail of this bill.

Mr. BACON. In other words, Mr. President, we want to see the bill in its entire form, and do not want to have to go and hunt for another statute to see what is really the law in reference to this matter.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I have no objection to having the bill go over, providing it can retain its place and have the same position on Wednesday that it has to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the bill goes over I would make this suggestion: As I listened to the reading of the bill, there is no provision that the Government's mortgage or lien shall be a first mortgage or lien. There is no limitation as to what it may come in behind, and there should be some more definite statement. Otherwise the Government may find itself compelled some day in foreclosure proceedings to own this railroad.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over without prejudice and hold its position on the calendar.

Mr. DEPEW. The position that it now holds, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], then, would be that the same order be entered for this bill for Wednesday, March 2, that is now in existence for Monday, February 28. Is there objection to entering that order? The Chair hears none.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS-METHODS COMMISSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 6168 may now be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6168) creating a government business-methods commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill has been heretofore read and amended.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill read as now amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill as amended will now be read.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be called the "government business-methods commission," to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the presiding officer thereof, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof; and any vacancy on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of this commission to inquire into and report to Congress at the earliest date or dates practicable, what changes are necessary or desirable in the methods of transacting the business of the Government or in the laws relating thereto, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission was created. The commission shall have the power, through subcommittee or otherwise, to examine witnesses and to make such investigations and examinations of the subjects committed to their charge as they shall deem necessary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] whether it might not be important to insert some words to put beyond doubt the power of the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives to make such appointment if a vacancy should occur in vacation? I do not know whether or not the language as it now stands would give that authority. Possibly, if there is any doubt, there ought to be some words inserted to cover and remove that doubt.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think they certainly would have the right to appoint whenever a vacancy occurred, whether in vacation or otherwise.

Mr. BACON. Possibly the colloquy which we now have might be sufficient.

Mr. HALE. It has always been done.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there is no question about the power. It was exercised in the case of another commission within my knowledge during vacation.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber, and I do not understand the status of this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will it be in order now to offer a substitute for the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the substitute for the bill, which I send to the desk and I ask that it may now be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That a commission is hereby created, to be called the 'Government business-methods commission,' to be composed of not exceeding nine members, to be appointed by the President of the United States; and any vacancy on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Such commission may be composed of such employees of the executive departments and such experts in business methods and administration as the President may designate. The President is authorized to fix the compensation of such experts or administrators, but the employees of the executive departments so appointed shall receive no extra compensation except for such incidental expense as they may be put to by reason of their duties on such commission. The total expenditures under this act, both for contingent expense and for salaries, until further authorized by law shall not exceed $50,000.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of such commission to inquire into and report to the President at the earliest date or dates practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the methods of transacting the business of the Government or in the laws relating thereto, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission was created. The commission shall have the power, through subcommittee or otherwise, to examine witnesses and to make such investigations and examinations of the subjects committed to their charge as they shall deem necessary. The President is authorized to carry out such recommendations of said commission as he may approve and as not inconsistent with existing law, and wherever changes in the existing law are necessary for such purpose he shall report the same to Congress.

"SEC. 3. That the President is also authorized to bring into coordination and cooperation the departments, bureaus, and services of the executive departments of the United States with a view to preventing duplication of work, improving business methods, and uniting the experience and information of the various departments, bureaus, and services in matters of construction and administration, and to appoint such boards and committees in connection therewith as he may deem advisable."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], which has just been read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am hardly prepared for the discussion of this matter, for I did not expect it to come up so soon, but as I understand the status regarding this bill it is this: The new Committee on Public Expenditures, which was expected to be a very important committee, organized with a view to so shaping the appropriation bills of the Government as to keep within our revenues, and organized with a view to diminishing public expenditures and economizing in government operations, has been in session upon two or three occasions, and a subcommittee was appointed with reference to business methods. Upon that subcommittee were the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HUGHES], and others; and their unanimous report was in favor of a joint commission, three members to be appointed by the Senate, three to be appointed by the House, and three to be appointed by the President, with a view to bringing into cooperation the legislative and the executive departments of the Government upon this important matter. That report was approved by the Committee on Public Expenditures in full session, not a dissenting voice at the time being raised against it, if my memory is correct.

The bill came into the Senate, and objection was made to it by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] upon the ground that it included in the commission appointees of the executive department, his contention being that the two departments should be kept absolutely separate and distinct in the consideration of these matters. To my surprise, that amendment was accepted by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who had charge of the bill, and it was therefore impossible for those who believe that the two departments should be brought into cooperation to make any successful issue against the proposed amendment. So the bill has been amended, and now stands before this body a bill for the organization of a joint commission of Senators and Representatives for the purpose of inquiring into the question of good business methods in the administration of the executive departments, and recommending changes in administration and changes in the law in order to accomplish that purpose.

I then, Mr. President, gave notice that I would offer a substitute, contending that if only one department of the Government was to be represented upon the commission, whose effective service demanded the cooperation of both departments, the wise thing to do was to give the President the power to appoint a purely executive commission, so that he could put upon that commission such chiefs of the various bureaus and services of the executive departments as he chose to assign to it, and bring in collaboration with them the best experts in the country.

It is perfectly obvious that this whole question involves simply and purely the question of executive administration, and, inasmuch as reform was to come from the executive department, and not from the legislative department, I thought it but fair as between the two to give the President of the United States the power to avail himself of the best capacity in his department and of the best capacity outside of his department, in order to bring about administrative and economic reform. So the matter stands to-day, upon the proposal of the Senator from Rhode Island, that only the legislative department shall be represented upon the commission, and the proposal of my substitute, that we shall immediately authorize the President of the United States to take such steps as are necessary to secure administrative reform in his department.

In connection with this, I have suggested that we should put in this bill a provision giving the President of the United States the power to bring into coordination and cooperation the various bureaus and services of the Government, so that their labors can be secured in the line of administrative reform through the organization of committees or boards or councils, which will arouse the esprit de corps of each bureau and service in the department affected and make them all harmonize their efforts to a common purpose.

We all know that the restraints of the Tawney amendment would paralyze the President of the United States in any act tending to bring the bureaus or services of his own department into coordination and cooperation. According to its terms, though that end might not have been intended, the President of the United States is not only forbidden to pay out of any funds whatever the expenses of such a board or council or commission or committee, or whatever you may term it, but he is absolutely forbidden to detail any man in the service in the line of joint action upon these important matters.

Of course Congress intended to aim a blow at President Roosevelt's activity in creating executive commissions, appointed by him under the recommendatory power enjoyed by the President under the Constitution, a power which makes the President of the United States a part of the legislative body.

We speak of the legislative department and of the executive department as being entirely distinct. That is true; but the President is a part of both. He is not only the Chief Executive of the United States, but he is charged by the Constitution itself with certain legislative functions. It is his right and his duty to make recommendations to Congress—not simply general recommendations, but to recommend measures—and it is his right to veto any action of both Houses of Congress; so that under the Constitution he is a part of the legislative branch of the Government.

Some may think that Mr. Roosevelt was a little too active in appointing commissions for the purpose of inquiring into various matters relating to economics and sociology, but undoubtedly he had the power to do it. The only power that he lacked was to pay for such services out of the National Treasury. That power he could not exercise without the sanction of Congress.

If Congress disapproved; if, in contravention of the law, the President was paying the expenses of these commissioners out of the public funds—though I have heard no instance of it—it was the right of Congress by law to declare that that should not be done, though it was not necessary for Congress to so declare by law, for clearly and obviously the President of the United States has not the power, in appointing a purely executive commission under his recommendatory power, to provide for the payment out of the public funds of the expenses of such a commission. But Congress went beyond that, and in the sundry civil act of last year by the so-called "Tawney amendment" declared:

Not only—

SEC. 9. That hereafter no part of the public moneys, or of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made by Congress, shall be used for the payment of compensation or expenses of any commission, council, board, or other similar body, or any members thereof, or for expenses in connection with any work or the results of any work or action of any commission, council, board, or other similar body, unless the creation of the same shall be or shall have been authorized by law—

But also—

Nor shall there be employed by detail, hereafter or heretofore made, or otherwise, personal services from any executive department or other government establishment in connection with any such commission, council, board, or other similar body.

So that unless the "commission, council, board, or other similar body" is expressly authorized by law, the President can not by detail or otherwise assign any employee of the executive departments to service upon such commission.

Now, then, I think it should have the power to authorize the President to appoint a board or boards composed of the officials of the executive departments, who can bring the various services and bureaus into coordination and cooperation for the purpose of advancing good business methods.

But under the provisions of the Tawney amendment the apparent purpose of Congress was to prevent the President from organizing a commission or even a committee in his own department for the purpose of acting in cooperation with reference to administrative reforms.

I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, if I may have his attention, whether, in his judgment, the following words in the Tawney amendment will prevent the President from appointing a purely executive board or commission or committee for the purpose of inquiring into and acting in cooperation with reference to questions of administrative reform:

Nor shall there be employed by detail, hereafter or heretofore made, or otherwise personal services from any executive department or other government establishment in connection with any such commission, council, board, or other similar body.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from Nevada, I should say that the President can appoint gentlemen to perform certain services in the executive departments, which I suppose he might call a commission or otherwise, but he has no right to pay them out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island. Now, may I ask the Senator from Maine his view regarding that matter?

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, that what is known as the Tawney provision is very far-reaching, and I think Congress intended that it should be. I think the purpose was to prevent too much government by commissions and boards, and that it was believed by Congress that some well-devised, well-phrased provision, as the Tawney amendment certainly is, should be applied to conditions then existing. I do not think with that provision a part, as it is, of the existing law any board, any commission, by whatever name it may be called, can be set afloat and make a voyage of discovery and of administration and spend any money.

It does not prevent certain boards and certain commissions which Congress, in terms, authorizes, and in certain cases, which are now existent, provides money for them. That domain is not invaded by the Tawney amendment; but generally speaking I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that unless the board is recognized by Congress—appropriated for—no money can be spent upon it; and, of course, the Senator understands that that practically does away with these numerous commissions. I think it is a matter upon which Congress can felicitate itself that the operation of the Tawney provision has largely, almost completely, put an end to the vagrant commissions which have sought to engross the right not only of administration but of legislation, and that the provision is working out for good to the public service.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator, then, specifically, whether under the Tawney amendment it would be within the President's province to appoint a board or a commission, to be called the "department good business methods commission," with a view to that commission making inquiries in the departments regarding present business methods and recommending changes, and with a view also to having such a board appear before the commission authorized by this amended bill and presenting their views as to changes in the law which may be necessary in order to make good business administration, provided that none of the moneys in the Public Treasury are drawn upon by such a board or commission?

Mr. HALE. Oh, undoubtedly, Mr. President, the President of the United States directly or acting through his ministers, the heads of the departments, could send one person or another, or one or many before this joint commission of the two Houses to make suggestions and to give information and to help mature proper results to be brought about by that commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I would ask the Senator whether he would not think it advisable to give the President some fund from which to pay the expenses of such a commission in employing proper expert aid?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senate is not now confronted with that question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether he would think it proper, as we are entering upon this investigation as to good business methods, to arm the President of the United States with the power and the means with which to make such an inquiry efficient?

Mr. HALE. I should not be in favor of a niggardly policy which would improperly cripple the hands of the Executive in any regular and legal function of his, and all that makes up a subject which will be dealt with when we come to the appropriation bills relating to the workings of the Government in the different departments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will we have the assurance of the Senator that he will endeavor to make provision for such expenses upon the part of the President?

Mr. HALE. So far as I am concerned, the Senator can have this assurance from me, that in the light of any matter when it is brought to my mind I will try to do the fair and reasonable thing not only for Congress, but for the President. I can not say now, the Senator can not say now, no Senator can now say what ought to be done on a problematical case. When any special thing, a distinct proposition, is brought before the Committee on Appropriations, or any committee that has charge of an appropriation bill, it will receive, so far as I am concerned, fitting attention.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have to say in that connection that I think the whole question is before us now. The Committee on Public Expenditures reported a bill which practically brought the two departments into coordination upon this commission and authorized the appointment of experts. Now, the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Rhode Island absolutely eliminates the executive department and makes it a one-sided inquiry.

I suggested that if there is to be a one-sided inquiry, that inquiry should be made by the department affected and not by a department that has nothing whatever to do with the administration. But I am willing to compromise, if you will take present action in this bill, and whilst you authorize a legislative commission you will also authorize a purely executive commission and give that executive commission the same power to employ experts and to pay them that is given to the legislative commission.

The Senator from Maine says that that is a thing for the future; that that is a thing for consideration when the appropriation bills come up. I say it is a thing to be settled now, for the whole question of good business methods in the departments is now before the Senate, and we are called upon here to provide the machinery essential to secure good business methods, and I insist upon it that we give the President himself the machinery, and not only the machinery, but the money. The Senator from Maine says he already has the machinery; that notwithstanding the plain terms of the Tawney amendmen he can appoint a commission or a board to make this investigation and inquiry. But he proposes now to deny him the means, whilst he is giving the legislative commission the means by which to make this inquiry; or, at all events, he proposes to postpone to a later day giving the President the means to make an inquiry that ought to be started now and for which he ought to have ample funds.

Now, in view of the fact that there is some difference of opinion between the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Maine—and here I will ask the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] for a moment—as to the real meaning of the words employed in the Tawney amendment, I would ask him whether, according to the plain terms of the Tawney amendment, the President could, even for the purpose of inquiry, even if he did not pay out a dollar of expense, organize a commission or board for the purpose of instituting good business methods, or whether he would, disregarding the law, have to rely upon his constitutional power, which Congress can not invade.

Mr. ROOT. I do not know whether the Senator from Nevada is authorized by the Senator from Maine, who is not present for the moment, to submit this question to me as referee or arbitrator. If the Senators from Maine and Rhode Island unite in its submission, I will try to answer the question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator from New York that the Senator from Maine is not absent from the Chamber, and, as he is silent, acquiescence can be presumed.

Mr. ROOT. Then, perhaps, we had better presume that he acquiesces in the views of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will not the Senator, for the information of the Senate, state what his opinion is as to the terms of the Tawney amendment?

Mr. ROOT. The terms of the Tawney amendment are very comprehensive. Of course, in construing statutes of that kind, and all statutes which deal with the method of performing executive duties, you have to construe them reasonably and sensibly with reference to the subject-matter to which they are to be applied; and I assume there are some commissions that would be excluded, and that there are other so-called "commissions" that would not be excluded.

The object of the act is plain; as the Senator from Maine has said, to prevent the substitution of a great variety of commissions unknown to the law for the ordinary processes of the law. I do not understand that it would prevent, or that it would be construed as preventing, the President, or even the heads of departments, from calling to their assistance a number of gentlemen who may act together in an advisory or investigating way for the purpose of assisting them in the performance of their duties. There is to be a practical, sensible application of the statute which adapts it to meeting the evil it was intended to cure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator then, as I understand, would be of the opinion that the section should be construed with reference to its purpose and not exactly by its words, and that it should be so construed as not to deny the President the power of appointing a commission or board for the purpose of bringing the services of the Government—whatever department they may belong to—into coordination and cooperation. Do I understand that, substantially, to be the view of the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. I would rather not give my assent to any statement except one I myself make.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no disposition, of course, to endeavor to trap the Senator from New York. I simply wished to understand what his view was before progressing with my argument. I think the Senator from New York will agree with me——

Mr. ROOT. It may be that I did not fully apprehend what it was that the Senator from Nevada had in his mind in asking the question. If I have failed to answer the question to his satisfaction, it is not because I did not mean to, but because I did not appreciate exactly what it was that he was driving at. It seems to me rather a moot question or an academic question. I do not know to what the Senator was seeking to apply any answer regarding this statute. I do not know why he thinks that an answer regarding it is relevant to anything before the Senate. I answered the question out of respect to the Senator from Nevada, not because I had the slightest idea what my answer was relevant to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will point out to the Senator from New York the relevancy of my question to this discussion. I am contending that if you propose to establish good business methods in the departments it will involve two things: One, reform in administration by the departments themselves; the other, possible changes in the law. The reforms in administration can, so far as they are consistent with existing law, of course be accomplished by the President without the interposition of Congress. The reforms in which changes of law are necessary can only be accomplished with the aid of Congress.

Now, then, I insist upon it that when we are starting out upon an era of organizing good business methods in the departments we should set both the executive department and the legislative department to work. Through the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Rhode Island, the executive department has been absolutely eliminated from this inquiry, although the subcommittee of which the Senator from New York is a member reported unanimously in favor of the inclusion of both, and although the Committee on Public Expenditures voted without dissent so far as I recollect in favor of it.

Now, then, the inquiry comes up as to what the executive department can do in aid of this work, and the first obstacle we encounter is the so-called "Tawney amendment," adopted by Congress two years ago toward the close of Mr. Roosevelt's administration, in which the President is forbidden to appoint any member of an executive department to any board or commission, or other similar body not authorized by law. The first question then comes up as to the meaning of that. The Senator from New York says it does not include this case. Then comes up the next question, How is the President to get the money with which to conduct the investigation? And with reference to that the Senator from Maine says that that is a matter for future action.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator afraid that if this is made a purely legislative commission the President of the United States will not cooperate with that commission to secure the results which are desired?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not fear at all that the President of the United States——

Mr. ALDRICH. I feel authorized to say for the President of the United States that he will cooperate to the fullest manner possible to secure it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no doubt——

Mr. ALDRICH. So I can see——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The question is, first, whether you are furnishing him with the machinery with which to cooperate; and, secondly, whether you are furnishing him with the means with which to cooperate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Nevada, or will any other Senator, question the power of the President of the United States to call together his heads of departments or head chiefs of bureaus, or any executive officer, and ask them to confer and cooperate with this commission? Does the Senator from Nevada deny that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not doubt the President's constitutional power to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does any Senator?

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I do believe that the terms of the Tawney amendment deny him that power, and, therefore, I was anxious to get the opinions of some of the leaders of the Senate as to whether or not he would be bound by the terms of the Tawney amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator has my opinion; and no Senator has risen in his place, and I venture to say that no one will, and has said that the President can not do that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to get that statement. It is a valuable statement. There is a feeling in the departments to-day that the Tawney amendment was designed to prevent just such appointments. Mr. Roosevelt appointed the Keep commission, and Congress had in view the so-called "meddlesomeness" of the Keep commission, as well as other things, when it passed the Tawney amendment. The Keep commission was simply a good business methods organization appointed by the President with a view to reforming administration.

Mr. ALDRICH. Knowing something about that legislation, I can say with absolute certainty that the Keep commission was not in the minds of the legislators when the Tawney amendment was adopted. It was a class of commissions like the one of which the Senator from Nevada was a member, the Waterways Commission, so-called, that were undertaking to determine what Congress should do with reference to the treatment of the waterways. I think there were one or two Members of Congress upon that commission. It was made up largely of people outside both the legislative department and the executive branch of the Government, and they were spending large sums of money—I do not know how much—in investigating subjects which ought never to have been submitted, I think, to a commission of that kind; and it was to hit cases of that kind, which, in the opinion of a great majority of both branches of Congress was substantially and abuse of the power of appointment of commissions, that that amendment was adopted. It was not to hit the Keep commission. The Keep commission was composed entirely of heads of departments, or of persons connected with the executive departments, whom it was clearly within the right of the President to appoint, and it was a commendable thing for any President to do. It was not commissions of that kind which were in the contemplation of Congress when the so-called "Tawney amendment" was adopted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. This debate is serving a useful purpose. It is clearing the atmosphere. I am glad to know now that notwithstanding the terms of the Tawney amendment expressly forbid the appointment of such a commission as the Keep commission, it was not in the contemplation of Congress.

Now, with reference to the Inland Waterways Commission, to which the Senator has referred and of which I was a member, I wish to say that I hesitated for some time before accepting an appointment upon that commission. However, I finally came to the conclusion that the President under his power of recommendation to Congress and with a view to informing himself concerning the development of our inland waterways for the purpose of recommending definite measures to Congress had the power to make an inquiry of that kind either individually or through a commission or board, and that it was the patriotic duty of any citizen to respond to his invitation to serve on such a commission. I am not aware that the commission spent any public moneys. So far as my personal expenses were concerned, I defrayed them myself, and I understood that to be the action of every other member of the commission. I believe that the President had the constitutional power to appoint that commission.

I believe that the commission, composed as it was of two Senators, two Representatives who have since become Senators, and five chiefs of the various scientific services of the Government, did good service and made a report that will be of value to the country, and which certainly was of value to the President in his recommendations, recommendations which will yet ripen into law under the force of public opinion. But, of course, he had no power to take a dollar out of the Treasury, unless authorized by law, and apply it to the expenses of the commission, and he never did.

Mr. President, we now find that, notwithstanding the express prohibition of the Tawney amendment, it is within the constitutional power of the President of the United States himself to appoint a good-methods commission composed entirely of chiefs of the departmental service and to engage them in this inquiry. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he would be willing to authorize in this bill the President of the United States in aid of such a commission to employ experts within a limited sum?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is an absurd question, it seems to me. This commission can employ experts. Why should the President employ other experts?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, as I understand, we have it that while the Senator from Maine suggests that when the proper time comes, on an appropriation bill, he will favor—he intimates it; he does not say so—an appropriation to pay such expenses as the executive department thinks are proper in the employment of expert services, I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to indicate that he would not favor such legislation?

Mr. ALDRICH. I can see no useful purpose in discussing hypothetical questions which may arise next year or the next year after that. The terms of the pending bill before the Senate are perfectly plain, and I think the terms of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nevada are perfectly plain. I am quite willing to submit those questions to the Senate for its action.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very intent upon making effective this movement for the introduction of good business methods in the departments of the Government. I do not see how that can be accomplished except by cooperation of the executive and the legislative departments, and I do not see how that can be accomplished unless you furnish to each the expert aid that is essential in this work.

You admit that expert aid is essential, for you have authorized its employment in this bill so far as the congressional committee is concerned. All that I ask you is that you should also authorize the President to proceed pari passu with you, so that he, through the experts and through the cooperative services of men now in the employ of the Government, can make inquiry and not only institute business methods, but also prepare to appear before the legislative commission and make recommendations as to needed changes in the law.

It seems to me an entirely reasonable thing to insist that while we are acting upon this subject-matter we should act upon it in its entirety and not by piecemeal. I can not understand why this committee, the Senator from Rhode Island having found his bill dismantled by an amendment not really put to the test of a vote in this body, but accepted by him without a contest, and conscious of the purpose of the Committee on Public Expenditures that the executive departments should cooperate in this great work, should deny now not only the machinery but the moneys essential to that purpose, and should leave this question a matter of doubt so far as the machinery is concerned, the Tawney amendment prohibiting the appointment of such a commission, and thus compelling the President to resort to construction or to the great source of all power, the Constitution itself, in order to enable him to act intelligently upon this subject.

I can not understand what purpose there can be in refusing to amalgamate these two bills—the amended bill offered by the Senator from Rhode Island and the substitute bill prepared by myself. They can be amalgamated. The substitute can be put in this bill, and it will simply give the President the power to appoint a commission to bring these services into coordination and to employ experts.

The Senator indicates that he has no disposition and the Senator from Maine at all events indicated that he has no purpose to deny the President this machinery and these moneys. Why not provide the machinery and the money now?

I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether, if I withdraw this as a substitute, he will accept it as an amendment and thus provide for an additional commission purely executive in character, and proceeding pari passu with our own in the investigation of this matter, so that the two departments of the Government, the legislative and the executive, can be brought into hearty cooperation on so important a subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if this commission should be appointed, and if there is any lack of cooperation on the part of the President, or if they have any reason to suppose that further or additional powers are necessary in order to secure the best results they can report that fact to Congress, and I have no doubt additional legislation will be enacted without dissent. But I see no reason at this stage for accepting the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada either as an amendment or as a substitute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I know I will be powerless to carry this substitute through.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether his amendment has been printed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It has. I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will again read the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That a commission is hereby created, to be called the "Government business-methods commission," to be composed of not exceeding nine members, to be appointed by the President of the United States; and any vacancy on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Such commission may be composed of such employees of the executive departments and such experts in business methods and administration as the President may designate. The President is authorized to fix the compensation of such experts or administrators, but the employees of the executive departments so appointed shall receive no extra compensation except for such incidental expense as they may be put to by reason of their duties on such commission. The total expenditures under this act, both for contingent expense and for salaries, until further authorized by law shall not exceed $50,000.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of such commission to inquire into and report to the President at the earliest date or dates practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the methods of transacting the business of the Government or in the laws relating thereto, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission was created. The commission shall have the power, through subcommittee or otherwise, to examine witnesses and to make such investigations and examinations of the subjects committed to their charge as they shall deem necessary. The President is authorized to carry out such recommendations of said commission as he may approve and as are not inconsistent with existing law, and wherever changes in the existing law are necessary for such purpose he shall report the same to Congress.

SEC. 3. That the President is also authorized to bring into coordination and cooperation the departments, bureaus, and services of the executive departments of the United States with a view to preventing duplication of work, improving business methods, and uniting the experience and information of the various departments, bureaus, and services in matters of construction and administration, and to appoint such boards and committees in connection therewith as he may deem advisable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that that be added to the bill as additional sections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada withdraw it as a substitute?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I withdraw it as a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada withdraws his substitute and offers it as an amendment to follow the last word in the bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States by M. C. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 26, 1910, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 5680. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River, in the State of Connecticut, between the towns of Old Saybrook and Old Lyme; and

S. 6191. An act to authorize the Fort Smith and Van Buren district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at Van Buren, in the State of Arkansas.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW COAL LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 390), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, reports rendered in connection with the investigation to determine the extent and value of the coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in Oklahoma, which investigation has been made under the direction of the Department of the Interior, pursuant to the act of June 21, 1906, which provides in part as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make practical and exhaustive investigation of the character, extent, and value of the coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in Indian Territory; and the expense thereof, not exceeding the sum of $50,000, shall be paid out of the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That any and all information obtained under the provisions of this act shall be available at all times for the use of the Congress and its committees.

There are also inclosed memorials of the Choctaw Nation protesting against the payment of the expenses of this investigation from the tribal funds and requesting the United States to purchase the surplus and undivided property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Civil Service Commission, submitting draft of proposed legislation providing that any member of the United States Civil Service Commission, or any officer, examiner, clerk, employee, or other representative thereof lawfully detailed to investigate frauds or attempts to defraud the Government or any irregularity or misconduct of any officer or agent of the United States, shall have authority to administer an oath to any witness attending to testify or depose in the course of such investigation.

The proposed legislation has my hearty approval, and I commend it to the careful consideration of the Congress.

RECLAMATION FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Chair hears no objection.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 388), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I wish to bring to the attention of the Congress the urgent need of legislation for the improvement of the personnel of the navy.

I am strongly of the opinion that the future of our navy will be seriously compromised unless the ages of our senior officers are materially reduced and opportunity is given thereby for experience and training for battle ship and fleet commands.

Under our present system the average age of captains is 55 years and of rear-admirals 60¼ years.

This is the direct result of an absurd system which allows nearly all officers, provided they retain their health, to pass through the various grades and retire as rear-admirals.

The greater number of our older commanding officers have had inadequate experience in command. Experience in command of a large vessel in the battle fleet is essential to the command of a division or squadron of the fleet, and preliminary training in flag officers' duties is necessary before succeeding to the chief command of a fleet. We are now training officers in command of battle ships and armored cruisers, many of whom can not serve as flag officers on account of their short time on the active list after reaching that grade.

The line of the navy is in an abnormal condition, the result of past legislation.

There is still a "hump" in the flag and command grades, there is a great deficiency of officers of suitable ages for the intermediate grades, there is the beginning of a new "hump" in the lower grades, and the total of all the grades is very considerably short of the requirements of the service.

The Congress, in 1903, authorized an increase in the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy, without increasing correspondingly the grades of officers, and the result is now a large "hump" near the bottom of the list, due to the large classes graduated since that date. Unless legislation relieves the situation, these young officers will have little promotion for many years to come. From now on, about 160 officers per year will enter the junior lieutenants' grade, and, under existing law, but 40 a year will be promoted out of it; so that that grade will increase out of proportion to the others.

The following table shows the ages of the oldest and youngest and the average ages of the flag officers of different grades and captains in the English, French, German, Italian, Austrian, and United States navies at the present time:

[About January 1, 1910.]

	Great Britain.			France.

Captains	61	50	55

[b] One only, 54 years.
[c] One only, 66 years.

The averages of rear-admirals of different countries, about January 1, 1910, were thus, as follows:

	Years.
Japanese	50
German	51
English	53
Austrian	55
Italian	56
American	60.5

The effect of the proposed measure would be to promote our officers to the grade of rear-admiral at an average age of 54 to 55, and to make the average of all the rear-admirals about 58.

The average ages of captains about January 1, 1910, were, from the same table, as follows:

	Years.
English	44
German	45
Austrian	50
Italian	51

The effect of the proposed measure would be to promote officers to the grade of captain at an average age of 46 to 47, and to make the average age of all the captains about 50.

The ages for rear-admirals and captains produced by the proposed measure are not young enough, in my opinion, for the arduous duties of the modern vessels of war and for the best success in a fleet engagement, should war come, but they are a decided improvement. To reduce the ages still further would not increase the cost; but for other reasons, I am unwilling to advocate any further reduction at the present time.

The creating of higher ranking flag officers is a military necessity. Through custom and tradition, at a time when the service was small, grades higher than that of rear-admiral were regarded as rewards of merit for exceptional war service. The size of the fleet now demands two grades above that of rear-admiral, which still would not compare with the grades to be found in foreign services. The customary naval grades are admiral of the fleet (grand admiral), admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral. Foreign fleets are commanded by admirals and vice-admirals. In international council, or in combined operations, the American admiral, whatever the importance of his command, must assume the junior position. In our Atlantic Fleet there are now four rear-admirals. There should be an admiral in command, a vice-admiral for the second squadron, and a rear-admiral for each of the other two divisions.

Considerations of proper military efficiency, as well as a due sense of national dignity and self-respect, as befitting this great Nation, urge that the existing situation shall cease.

The Secretary of the Navy has prepared a tentative bill for reorganizing the personnel of the navy, which is at the disposition of the Congress should it be desired. This proposed plan for relief meets with my hearty approval.

OUTLINE OF PROPOSED MEASURE.

The personnel of officers and men is based on the tonnage of effective ships. Increases or decreases of ships, due to authorization by Congress or to sale or other disposal, will increase or decrease the personnel in a fixed proportion. In time, though, the increases in new tonnage will be offset by old ships struck from the list. Adequate provisions are made to guard against sudden fluctuations in the personnel.

The ratio provided is 100 men and 5 line officers and midshipmen for every 2,000 tons of ships, including ships authorized and building, the principle being followed that it takes as long to train the midshipmen and enlist and train the men as it does to build the ships.

With 1,200,000 tons of ships, as now authorized, the ultimate personnel would reach 3,000 line officers and midshipmen and 60,000 enlisted men, but under the measure as drawn the full authorized strength of officers and men can not be reached for a number of years to come, nor in any case, except with the approval of the Congress year by year.

The officers, as now, are to be drawn from the Naval Academy, with certain additions from the ranks, as authorized by existing law; but it is not proposed to increase the present size of the Naval Academy classes, and it is estimated that under present conditions it will take about eight years for the full strength of officers to be reached.

As regards the men, the present authorized strength is 44,500. The current estimates provide for 47,500, which estimates are not to be altered. In future years, if approved by the Congress, the number can be brought up gradually to the proportion required for the actual ships, the present measure not authorizing any increase.

After the grades of officers assume the fixed proportions set for them there will be an excess in the upper grades due to promotion for length of service.

Each July 1 a board of high ranking officers recommends sufficient retirements to reduce such excess.

The rate of pay for such retired officers will depend on length of service. After eighteen years they would get about one-fourth pay, after twenty years about one-third pay, after twenty-four years about one-half pay, and after thirty years three-fourths pay.

The method of retirement is an important part of the proposed plan. At present too many officers reach the highest grade and retire with the rank of senior rear-admiral, without adequate return to the Government.

The present personnel law of 1899 has been in operation eleven years. In that time 304 officers have retired from age, length of service, or by operation of the law. In the next eleven years, if the proposed measure becomes operative, there will be about 138 retirements from the same causes, at a cost of less than one-half the former 304.

The lengths of service proposed for line officers in the various grades will bring promotion, at the latest, at the ages set forth following:

	Years.
Age at entry	18
Ensign	22
Lieutenant (junior grade)	25
Lieutenant	28
Lieutenant-commander	36
Commander	42
Rear-admiral	55

The staff corps are put on the same basis as the line, as nearly as the requirements of the different corps will permit.

EXPENSE OF PROPOSED MEASURE.

In drawing up the measure which I have approved, a prime consideration was that there was to be no immediate increase in expense, nor, except for authorized increases in ships, any eventual increase.

On the basis of tonnage, any increase in both officers and men must be authorized each year by Congress when it authorizes ships.

The saving in this measure is principally in the retired list of the line. Under the present law, and that which preceded it, most retirements were from the higher grades at the higher rates of pay. Under the proposed plan, with the exception of the captains already due for promotion to the grade of rear-admiral, no increase of rank is allowed on retirement, and retirements will be distributed along the grades at rates of pay which depend on length of service.

Finally, I wish to emphasize to the Congress that this measure is intended primarily to reduce the ages of the officers in the senior grades of the line of the navy and to secure more efficient captains and flag officers.

Incidentally it is intended to increase the efficiency of the staff corps by providing some measure of compulsory retirement for them and some increases which are necessary.

While it might be possible to include improvement in some other minor details of the line and staff corps, these matters are not directly concerned with improving the military efficiency of the fleet, and I deem it best not to complicate the desired improvement by introducing them at this time.

The wisdom of Congress, urged by the overwhelming voice of the people of our country, has provided us with ships of the best quality. It is necessary that our personnel of officers match these superb vessels if the navy is to be at the efficiency which is vitally necessary for its chief purpose and only reason for existence.

I earnestly urge upon the Congress the passage of suitable personnel legislation.

JOHN REED, ALIAS MICHAEL FLANAGAN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2072) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company D, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, on the 25th day of July, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETER FLEMING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2445) for the relief of Peter Fleming, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Peter Fleming, now a resident of Colorado, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Battery E, Third Regiment United States Artillery, on the 8th day of May, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. WARREN. I move the concurrence of the Senate in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM KEYES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4672) to correct the military record of William Keyes, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of the pension laws William Keyes shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company B, One hundred and forty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, on the 30th day of October, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of William Keyes."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 1, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The Speaker laid before the House the following credentials:

STATE OF GEORGIA.

By his excellency Joseph M. Brown, governor of said State, to the Hon. S. A. Roddenbery, greeting:

Whereas by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States of America it is ordained and established that the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and

Whereas by the returns, made agreeably to law, of the election held on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1910, for one Member to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States for the unexpired term of two years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1909, you, the said S. A. RODDENBERY, were duly elected one of the Representatives in and by the Second Congressional District of said State:

These are, therefore, to commission you, the said S. A. RODDENBERY, to take session in the House of Representatives of the United States for the unexpired term of two years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1909, and to use and exercise all and every the privileges and power which of right you may, or can do, in and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, in behalf of this State.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in Atlanta, this 22d day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-fourth.

By the governor:

JOSEPH M. BROWN, Governor.
PHILIP COOK, Secretary of State.

Mr. RODDENBERY appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

ABANDONMENT OF JEFFERSON STREET.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I call up the bill H. R. 16915, to authorize the abandonment of Jefferson street between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue NW., Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to abandon Jefferson street, between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue NW., as indicated on the first section of the highway extension plans; and any future subdivision shall omit said part of Jefferson street lying between said limits.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the purpose of abandoning this street?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is a little piece of land at the corner of Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue. On the Colorado side it is 105 feet in length, on the north side 65 feet, on the west side of Fourteenth street it is the same width as on Jefferson street, and on the south side it is 115 feet. It is a little piece of land about 22 feet high, and never will be used for highway purposes. The gentlemen who own the piece of property have written a letter stating that they would give to the District, I think, about 20 feet on the south end of it where some steps can be put in to pass from Fourteenth street to Colorado avenue. The District has no title to it; it is a part of the highway plan of Jefferson street.

Mr. MADDEN. What has the District got to do with it if it has no title to it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was a part of the original highway plan, part of the plan for Jefferson street when it was laid out.

Mr. MADDEN. What is going to become of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The title rests with these people who owned the land originally.

Mr. MADDEN. You are going to give away some more property, are you?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; we are giving a release to whatever interest the District may have by reason of its being a part of the highway plan when Jefferson street was laid out. The District never will use it. It has never been opened and never will be.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know any reason why it should be abandoned?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; because the District will never utilize it. Furthermore, these gentlemen who own it have written a letter, which I will put into the RECORD or have read now, in which they say they will deed a small portion of the south end of that lot to the District for the purposes for which I stated.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do they do that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not tell the gentleman why they do it. They have written a letter saying they would do it.

Mr. MADDEN. How much more is this land worth that is supposed to be abandoned than the land which they propose to give to the District?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think there are 8,100 square feet in it. I would not undertake to say how much it is worth.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be a good idea for the committee to know all of the facts connected with this before they recommend it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think we do know all that is necessary to know.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the committee does not know very much.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is it the gentleman would like to know that we do not know?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know how much it is worth, what the city proposes to do with it, who it is that is going to give it up, how much it is going to get for it, why it is going to abandon it, what advantages there are to the District by its abandonment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. O Mr. Speaker, two-thirds of those questions I have already answered.

Mr. MADDEN. I have not heard one answered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will answer the question. First, this was part of the original highway plan when Jefferson street was laid out, and, secondly, the District has no use for it now, nor will it ever have.

Mr. MADDEN. Let them make a park out of it if they have not any other use for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have no title to it in order to make a park of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course they have title to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; they have not. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KAHN. It belongs to private owners.

Mr. MADDEN. Then what have we to do with it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are simply abandoning it, taking it out of the original highway plan.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do we need to legislate if this property belongs to private owners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because, I have said to the gentleman, that it was a part of the highway plan. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who will tell me what he knows about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will give way to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this piece of property is owned by private owners. The highway plan that was adopted some years ago would in time put a street through there. The property would then have to be condemned, and the price of the property would have to be paid to these private owners.

Now, the land there is very steep. There is a great declivity. It has been determined by the engineer commissioner that it would be impracticable at any time to open up that area as a street, the grade being entirely too heavy. Besides that, the property is located in a portion of the block that is only a very short distance from the main highway that comes up from the lower grade, so that it is no inconvenience for anybody who wants to go in that direction to go around the corner and take the street that leads to the lower grade.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask this: If the property is owned by private individuals now, what has the District government got to abandon?

Mr. KAHN. Well, these private individuals probably want to put up some improvements, and they feel that they do not want later on to have their improvements condemned.

Mr. MADDEN. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], in charge of the bill, says that the District government has no ownership in this property which it is proposed to abandon.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman from California says that the property is owned by private individuals. Now, if it is owned by private individuals, the District has no ownership in it at all, and there is no reason why we should legislate to abandon it. Why do they want us to abandon something we have not any interest in at all?

Mr. KAHN. We want to abandon the plan which contemplates at some future time the possibility of cutting through a street there. If that street were ever cut through, the property would have to be condemned and purchased by the District. Now, the present owners contemplate erecting some important improvements there.

These improvements would have to be purchased by the District, and a considerable sum of money would have to be paid by the District for these improvements in addition to the price paid for the land, if that street were ever opened up. It is in order to save that money and in order to avoid the possibility of additional expense to the District that this legislation is contemplated.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that it came out in the hearings that the District of Columbia has the ownership of this property.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MADDEN. Let the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] reply if he knows anything about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will state before the committee it was stated that the District had already acquired this easement. I have a memorandum made upon the bill at the moment, and nobody disputed it, that it had acquired the easement of that piece of property there, 160 feet long.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suggest to the gentleman the easement spoken of there is what the District would acquire under the highway plan, when Jefferson street was originally laid out under the original plan.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a matter of no consequence as to whether or not the District of Columbia has actually acquired and paid for this property. I consider that it should not be abandoned, because the people who seek its abandonment admit that a portion should be reserved at least for a walk way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; they do not admit it; they simply write a letter here that they will give outright to the District so much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, why do they come and make the suggestion, may I ask?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why, just as the gentleman from California has said, these people can go ahead and erect buildings there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. After it is abandoned and the buildings have been erected this walk way can never be secured.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will state to the gentleman I hold in my hand a copy of the letter they have written to the District Commissioners, and which I offered to have printed in the RECORD, and I would like for the gentleman to hear it. I will read it——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I know what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They offer to deed so much, so that the District can have absolute title.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is quite a difference between offering to deed and an actual conveyance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say to the gentleman right here, if there is any doubt as to what these gentlemen will do, I have here a bill, and I will move to strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill under consideration and insert this bill, which expressly provides what the owners are to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not understand why that has not been done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can tell you why. Engineer Commissioner Judson came before the committee, and I think the gentleman will recall that he said the course which we are now pursuing, in his judgment, was the better way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Nobody can make me believe it is better to surrender that which you already have and then afterwards be compelled to condemn a part of that same property.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You have no title to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The proposition ought to be to release so much as is not needed, and retain the rest; then we would actually have——

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. You may.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the Government anything which amounts to more than a cloud on the title, that being a map in which this was given as part of a street?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Congress has found it necessary to have that piece of property opened as a highway.

Mr. PAYNE. But we have not paid for it; we have not acquired title to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, this bill——

Mr. PAYNE. Have we acquired title to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill proposes to abandon that right and afterwards to acquire, subject to the will of these people, a part of the same property.

Mr. PAYNE. I agree with the gentleman that it all ought to be expressed in the bill, whatever the bargain is; but it seems to me that if we are giving any opportunity for relief of this cloud on the title and these people propose now to go ahead and put valuable improvements on it, so if we condemn it we will have to pay a much larger sum for it, we do not want it, and the best way will be to pass the bill upon their conveying this portion they propose to convey to relieve whatever cloud there is on the title of the balance of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the statement made by him is the best reason yet advanced why we should not abandon this property. The reason is that when we abandon it these buildings of which you speak may be erected; and, afterwards, when we want enough ground there for this walk way we can not get it. The gentleman agrees with me that the whole transaction should be embodied in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not hardly understand the gentleman, but I am in favor of having everything embodied in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] a question or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] does not appear to have the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose this bill passes, who gets the fee to this land?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The abutting property owners.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. KAHN. The present owners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Government has nothing but the easement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who has the title to this land now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know their names.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the city of Washington simply have an easement over it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; as it has on all the streets.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it abandons its claim, where does the title go?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To the original property holders.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What do they want to abandon it for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In my judgment, to get more land.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That certainly is not the situation at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That may be. I have said that there is a 22-foot grade there, and it never will be opened as a street.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is a 24-foot grade in 160 feet of length.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I perhaps made a mistake. The engineer commissioner testified there was a 22 per cent grade there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The report says 25 per cent grade, but the engineer commissioner testified 24.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is all the way from 22 to 23 or 24.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is immaterial.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is this much about it, that the District will never use it for a highway.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But it is proposed to use it as a highway for a walk way instead of a driveway.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is done in different portions of the city now. The commissioners have built walk ways for people to walk over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. According to your own statement, you propose to do by two bills what could be done by one, if it should be done at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, to save any question in this matter, I have a letter here that has been addressed to the District Commissioners saying they would deed the south 20 feet. I will move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and insert the following bill in order to overcome the objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not yet heard what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It will take but a minute to read, and there is nothing but what anybody can understand. The motion is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the bill that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to strike from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia Jefferson street NW., between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue, and to omit the said street between the limits named from any future subdivision of the parcel of ground through which the said Jefferson street runs: Provided, That the owners of the parcel of ground through which the said Jefferson street between the limits named runs shall dedicate to the District of Columbia the south 20 feet of the said Jefferson street between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I fail to catch just the idea.

Mr. MANN. It is 20 feet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Read it again, and let us see.

Mr. MANN. That is what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, now, to prevent any question, I will ask the Clerk to read it again. It says 20 feet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that under the law in the District of Columbia the District owns all the streets, and that the adjacent property owners have no right like they have in many other cities. The entire width of the street is dedicated to the District of Columbia. If this bill passes in the form that it is in under this amendment, this land will not go to the adjacent property holders, will it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The title to this piece of property is in private parties. This was included in part of the original highway plan, when Jefferson street was laid out. As the District will never use this little plot of land the purpose is to amend the bill with the bill which has just been substituted for the original bill, which provides further that the people, the owners, will dedicate to the District the south 20 feet of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, but is not this street within the original plan of highways?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly; Jefferson street is within the original highway system.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Were not all the streets at that time dedicated absolutely to the District?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding is that they were by the adjacent property owners.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In order to put a plot of the subdivision on record, it requires the approval of some District official, I take it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The District Commissioners.

Mr. MANN. On account of the provision heretofore made by law the plot can not be approved, and hence can not be placed on record, unless in certain cases they dedicate certain widths under the highway plan. In most cities that is not the requirement. I think that probably causes the confusion here. This street, although never dedicated, although the easement has never yet been given to the public, is shown on the highway plan, and the property owners there are not permitted to subdivide their property and record their plats without having dedicated this street. This proposition, as I understand it, is simply to change the requirements, so that these people may subdivide their property and put their plats on record upon dedicating 20 feet of it, instead of the ordinary width, because it is impossible to improve a street of the ordinary width, and it is practicable to make steps upon 20 feet of it. That is it, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless there are some more questions, I will ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 56.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16915) to direct that Jefferson street NW., between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue, be stricken from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia.

EXTENSION OF MILITARY ROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 20164).

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20164) authorizing the extension of Military road NW., in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within six months after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Military road NW., through parcels 87–17 and 87–16, with a width not to exceed 75 feet, upon such lines as the Commissioners of the said District of Columbia may deem best for the public interests: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the said condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits, and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee is very complete, and I will ask to have it read.

The report (by Mr. FISH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20164) authorizing the extension of Military road NW., in the District of Columbia, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill was submitted to the committee and strongly recommended by the commissioners in the following letter:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 31, 1910.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit herewith draft of a bill authorizing the extension of Military road NW., in the District of Columbia, and to request its enactment.

A map is inclosed on which is shown in red the land necessary to be acquired for this small extension. This land consists of two small triangles containing about 4,000 square feet of land, the estimated value of which is about $2,000.

The extension is necessary in order to make a straight connection from Georgia avenue to the Military road. This road is one of the entrances to Rock Creek Park, and is much used by automobilists and others. The entrance to the road from Georgia avenue is now very narrow, and on account of the many turns necessary in order to enter the road a very dangerous condition for travel is created. If the land shown in red on the plat is condemned, it will cause a straight entrance and increase the width, both of which conditions are very desirable.

Very respectfully,
THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By CUNO H. RUDOLPH, President.

Hon. S. W. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. To address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan exhausted his right to the floor when he moved to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation. If the gentleman wishes to resume the floor, I am perfectly willing to stand here while he does so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Go ahead.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a proposition different from the one relating to the bill.

Some time ago the District Commissioners changed. Two former District Commissioners, of very high repute, and who, I think, had given very great satisfaction, retired, and two other commissioners were appointed, who, I do not doubt, will give great satisfaction.

I call attention to an article published in one of the papers of the city at the time of the retirement of the two former commissioners. A portion of the article reads like this:

Alonzo Tweedale, auditor of the District, who has worked side by side with Mr. West in the business and financial affairs of the District government, bade his former chief good-bye in the name of everyone connected with the departments which fell under Mr. West's charge. At the close of the farewell he stepped forward, pointing to a magnificent silver service in colonial style, and testified for his fellow-workers that the appreciation for Mr. West was sincere and solid.

"After a service of more than seven years as commissioner," Mr. Tweedale said, "you, at your own request, have just severed your official relations with the municipal government of the District of Columbia, and we who served with you take this opportunity to express our appreciation of your true worth as a competent, painstaking, and zealous public official."

In the course of his remarks he said further:

In expressing our regret that our pleasant official relations have been now severed, and with the assurance that you carry with you our deep affection, gratitude, and best wishes for unbounded success in your future work, we take this opportunity to tender you this silver service as a token of our esteem.

That was one of the presentations to Mr. West. One of the presentations to the other commissioner is spoken of in this language:

GIFT FROM FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Then a real surprise was sprung. The fire department had been keeping it under the hat of Chief Wagner for a long time, and though some persons suspected something was going to happen, few really had any idea of what was in the wind.

Mr. Macfarland went back to his former office and Chief Wagner, Deputy Chief Sullivan, Battalion Chiefs Keliher, Henry, and Proctor, Superintendent of Repairs Robinson, and Chief Clerk Watson met him there with a handsome gold watch.

The chief acted as spokesman and made the presentation with this speech:

"Mr. Macfarland, we have come here to-day to express our regret at your leaving office. We feel, officially, that we have lost a head who had always the best interests of the fire department and its members at heart, and, personally, that a true, good friend is about to leave us.

"We appreciate what you have done for the department—what you have done for us, both as individuals and as public servants—and while we are unable to give full expression of our gratitude, yet the officers and members of the department felt that the least they could do would be to thank you in person and to offer this small token of their esteem and good wishes.

"We hope that it will be of use to you and that it will serve for many years to come to remind you of your grateful friends who had the honor and good fortune to serve under you for so many years."

Then this article proceeds:

The silver service is of elegant form and simple design. The inscriptions attached to the gifts are "Henry B. F. Macfarland, from his fellow-workers in the government of the District of Columbia."

The gift to Mr. West was a large silver service of six pieces, all wrought in colonial style. It consisted of a large silver tray of handsome design, a coffee pot with an ebony handle, a teapot, a sugar bowl, and drip bowl.

The inscription on the tray reads as follows:

"To Henry Litchfield West, as a token of appreciation and esteem from those who were associated with him in various branches of the District service during his terms as Commissioner of the District of Columbia, 1902–1910."

In connection with these presentations to retiring District officials it may be interesting to read a provision of the United States Statute in reference to the subject of collecting subscriptions from subordinate officials in order to present to an official in charge some appreciation of the subordinate officials.

Section 1784 of the Revised Statutes provides:

No officer, clerk, or employee in the United States Government employ shall at any time solicit contributions from other officers, clerks, or employees in the government service for a gift or present to those in a superior official position; nor shall any such officials or clerical superiors receive any gift or present offered or presented to them as a contribution from persons in government employ receiving a less salary than themselves; nor shall any officer or clerk make any donation as a gift or present to any official superior. Every person who violates this section shall be summarily discharged from the government employ.

It may be claimed by these gentlemen that they are not in the government employ. I will not argue that question. If there is any reason why the subordinates in the departments in Washington should be forbidden to contribute to the purchase of presents to their superior officials, the same reasons apply to the officials of the District of Columbia. The reason is, in the first place, a moral one. I fear that many of the departments have forgotten that this provision of law exists. It was not very many years ago that a prominent official in the Interior Department upon retiring from office received gifts of considerable value, paid for by contributions forced from the clerks that worked under his supervision; and I say that whether the statute applies to these particular officials or not, it is contrary to all idea of the proper conduct of government for the chief of the fire department of the District of Columbia to require the officials under him to contribute money that he may make a present to anybody, and the same applies to the District auditor. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

SETTING ASIDE CERTAIN LANDS FOR STREET PURPOSES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 17754) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to set aside certain lands for street purposes, and so forth.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to set aside for street purposes so much of lot 16 in Baer's subdivision of Granby, now owned by said District of Columbia, as lies within the lines of Twentieth and Jackson streets as said streets are shown on the recorded plans for a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities, and they are hereby further authorized to sell or exchange at a fair valuation so much of said lot as lies without the limits of said Twentieth street, between Jackson and Kearney streets, any money derived from the sale of said lot to be covered into the United States Treasury, one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the report is brief, and I would like to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read the report [by Mr. SMITH of Michigan], as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred H. R. 17754, authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to set aside certain lands for street purposes, etc., report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The purpose of this bill is the extension of two streets—Twentieth and Jackson streets NE.—just where they intersect in a lot of ground formerly used for school purposes, but long since abandoned. The land, aggregating 29,780 square feet, was bought June 29, 1869, for $240. When the permanent highway extension plan for the District was subsequently adopted by Congress, the intersection of the aforesaid streets fell on these grounds.

The amount of land required for the extension of the two streets is 24,423 square feet, and the rest of the parcel will be left in four small portions, aggregating 5,357 square feet, which the bill provides shall be sold or exchanged.

This land is not needed for any school purposes. It is about 4,000 feet distant from the nearest colored school and about 1,600 feet distant from the nearest white school, so it is not needed as a playground in conjunction with any existing school. It is not deemed best to maintain the site with a view to its ultimate use for school purposes, inasmuch as it falls right at the intersection of the two streets named.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have given the proposition their approval, as appears by the following letter:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 29, 1910.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on House bill 17754, Sixty-first Congress, second session, authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to set aside certain lands for street purposes, etc., which you referred to them for examination and report.

The object of the bill is to extend Twentieth and Jackson streets NE. through a lot which was purchased and used many years ago as a school site, but which has long since been abandoned, and which is now used as a thoroughfare; and to sell or exchange the remaining portion of said lot which is not needed for highway purposes. A plat is inclosed showing in red the part of the lot which will be used for highway purposes, and in green the portion which the bill authorizes the commissioners to sell or exchange. It is provided in the bill that any money derived from the sale of the portion of the lot not needed for street purposes shall be paid into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia. The lot was purchased from an appropriation, one half of which came from the United States Treasury and the other half from revenues of the District of Columbia.

There is no likelihood that this lot will ever be needed as a school site, and in its present situation it blocks the extension of the two streets—Jackson street and Twentieth street.

The commissioners believe that the proposed disposition of the lot is a proper one, and that its conversion to the uses proposed by the bill is for the public benefit. They therefore recommended favorable action on the bill.

Respectfully,

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By CUNO H. RUDOLPH, President.

Hon. S. W. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FASSETT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the following title:

H. R. 18586. An act amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill H. R. 19403 and engrossed Senate amendments thereto, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

SETTING ASIDE CERTAIN LANDS FOR STREET PURPOSES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan who is to decide what the fair value of this property is?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Commissioners of the District.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it going to be sold through the court? I do not understand why the District of Columbia has got to go to a court to decide whether they can sell property. But you are not trying to buy lands, you are trying to sell, are you not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, you are not going to condemn the property you want to sell. What I want to find out is, in this case, who is to fix the value of the property, whether we are going to get what the property is worth? I want to find out whether we are going to give the property away to somebody, or not.

Mr. NORRIS. Ought we not to find out whether we want to sell it or not, and how much there is of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are 5,357 square feet.

Mr. MADDEN. We are buying property here all the time, and a lot of these philanthropists in the District of Columbia who have property for sale on which they own options, on which they secured the options at a low price, which they want the Government to pay them a high price for, now want to buy this property from the Government. Somebody in the District has said to the officials of the District that we no longer need the land.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want any time. I want to ask a few questions of the gentleman from Michigan to find out about this case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hold in my hand a plat of this land.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not care about that, what I want to find out is who fixes the terms on which the land is to be sold?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The commissioners, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should the commissioners fix the terms, or why should the commissioners be authorized to sell the land at all? I think it is bad policy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not needed for street purposes, and the gentleman will see on this map here the two little strips in green that represent the land covered by this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Did it ever occur to the gentleman from Michigan that it might be needed for some other purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not conceive what it would be needed for.

Mr. MADDEN. We are buying land every day for playgrounds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is not large enough for playgrounds.

Mr. MADDEN. It is adjacent to two schoolhouses.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois take the map and look at the two small green slips representing this land?

Mr. MADDEN. I see it; it contains 5,000 and more square feet of land.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In two narrow strips.

Mr. MADDEN. It is within 800 feet of one schoolhouse and 1,600 feet of another. There ought to be an opportunity given for the children to use the land for playgrounds. There might be an opportunity for the District to use the land for beautifying the neighborhood. We ought to make a small park of it. It can be used for a small park or a playground. If we are going to sell the land at all, this condition should be required: That the commissioners be given authority to ascertain what price the land can be sold for, and then Congress ought to decide whether it is a fair price or not; and after we have decided on that, we can decide whether we want to sell it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman not think we ought to repose confidence enough in our three commissioners to dispose of 5,357 square feet of land?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think we ought to give blanket authority to anybody to sell property that belongs to the United States Government before we know what they are going to sell it for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are going to sell it for money, and put half of the money in the Treasury of the United States and the other half in the treasury of the District.

Mr. MADDEN. We want to know what they are going to get for it.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Where is this land located?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the northeast portion of the District, near Twentieth and Jackson streets. It is about 5 miles from the District building.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Have the commissioners stated what they were going to sell this land for?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are going to sell the land, the 5,357 feet, and they ask authority in this bill to sell that little strip of land on either side of the road.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. What have they been offered for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that they have been offered anything for it. I do not know that they have offered it for sale. They are asking authority to sell.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Has the gentleman any information showing the probable value of the land and what the Government will get out of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I do not know what the value of land is in that neighborhood.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. And the proposition is to leave it entirely to the commissioners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly. We do that frequently. We are only following the usual custom in these matters. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether this land could be used for playground purposes was gone into by the committee, and it seems that the two tracts are so very narrow and small that they are practically valueless for that purpose. I think the strip is 11 feet wide at one end and 24 feet at the extreme other end on one side of the street, and on the other side of the road it is 9 inches wide at one end and 11 feet at the other. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is entirely mistaken as to the distance to the nearest school. The nearest school is 1,600 feet, one-third of a mile away, and the other school is 4,000 feet, almost a mile away. The commissioners have explained that perfectly. So far as the value of this tract of land is concerned, the committee has absolute confidence in the commissioners, and the commissioners are authorized by this bill not to sell it outright, if in their judgment they deem an exchange preferable. They are authorized either to exchange or to sell the land. The committee has deemed it wise to give them discretion in that matter. The land is seemingly of little value to the city, and for that reason it was deemed best to sell or exchange it. The whole tract cost the city and the Government of the United States $240 originally.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wish to ascertain from the gentleman whether he thinks the principle involved in the question of disposing of this land is worth considering.

Mr. KAHN. I think the question was gone into by the committee very fully with the commissioners, and I want to say to the gentleman that I have absolute confidence in the integrity of the commissioners. They have taken an oath to support the Constitution and the law, just as the gentleman and I have.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not questioning the integrity of the commissioners. I am making inquiry about the method that is being pursued in the granting of authority to the commissioners. The point with me is this: I think there is a principle involved here, and it does not matter whether it is 1,000 square feet of land or 1,000,000 square feet of land, the principle is just the same. If the District of Columbia has land to dispose of, it ought first to decide whether it wishes to dispose of the land or not, and then it ought to decide what it is willing to sell the land for.

Mr. KAHN. They may not want to sell this land. They may want to exchange it for some other land under this very bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The commissioners ought not to be given absolute power to make final disposition of this property without reporting back to this House what they can do with the property. The commissioners ought to be given authority to ascertain what they can secure for the land, and they ought to be obliged to report back to this House what they can secure for it before we act finally.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think the House would be better informed if it knew exactly in dollars and cents what the property would bring?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, I certainly do.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think the House would withhold its consent to sell the property in case the commissioners deemed its use by the District as remote?

Mr. MADDEN. My experience in public affairs leads me to the conclusion that when the public has land for sale it is never worth much, but when the public wants to buy land it is always worth a great deal. Now, there is an argument being made that this land is not worth anything, and if we had to buy it it would be extremely valuable. It seems to me that we would want to know what we are going to pay for it if we were going to buy it. If that is the case, we ought to know what we are going to get for it if we are going to sell it, and why should we as Members of Congress be called upon to vote blanket authority to somebody to sell something that is owned by the Government without knowing why we are doing it or what we are going to get for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman if he knows when this property was acquired?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was acquired June 29, 1869, the entire property, and we paid $240 for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Who paid it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Half was paid by the District of Columbia and half by the General Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The reason for my asking that question is indicated in the last two lines of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, I see one very serious objection to this bill, and that is this, that the commissioners are authorized "to sell or exchange at a fair valuation." Now, I take for granted that when it is sold they would receive money in payment; but when they exchange, without any limitation upon the word in the bill, what do they get in exchange? They could swap it off for jackknives——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hardly think that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Or anything else they may choose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hardly think the gentleman from Kentucky thinks that the three distinguished commissioners we have now would trifle away this land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not saying what they would do, but I am talking about what they are permitted to do under the provisions of this bill. And, in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, this bill gives them the right to sell at private sale. There may be 100 people who would like to buy it, but under this bill the commissioners would never find perhaps but one man who would like to buy. There ought to be a provision in the bill that if a sale would be had it should be sold at public sale, and until that is done I shall vote against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have not any hesitation in saying to the gentleman from Kentucky that the commissioners will seek to get all they can for this property, either by private sale or public sale.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But the bill would compel them in every instance, instead of leaving it to the discretion——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield the gentleman from Nebraska five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there are at least two good reasons why this bill, if unamended, should not pass the House. I want to say, to begin with, I do not question the honesty or ability of the commissioners or others who will have to do with the carrying out of the will of Congress if this law should pass, but there is a principle involved in it that we can not afford to establish by the passage of this particular bill. One is that property belonging to the Government and to the District shall be sold at private sale by the commissioners, and another is that these same commissioners may practically buy at private sale. If this land is to be sold—I am not saying that it should not; I do not know as to that—but if it is to be sold it ought to be sold at public sale to the highest bidder. We ought not to put in the hands of the commissioners the right to go out and buy land. Under this bill they can trade this off for town lots in the city of New York if they want to do so. They can trade it off for personal property in some other part of the District——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would you be satisfied with an amendment, in line 10, after the word "sale," to insert the words "at public sale?"

Mr. NORRIS. I would be satisfied in regard to this bill if we simply cut out all the bill after the opening up of these streets and let the balance be for the further consideration of the committee and further legislation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that under the statutes by which authority to sell by the different departments is usually conferred is authority to sell at private sale, which has been the law for a great many years?

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman is asking a question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I did not understand it. Will the gentleman repeat it?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said he thought we ought to establish a precedent of selling at private sale, yet, as I recall, the revised statutes already have prescribed that practice and precedent for a great many years.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if that be true, it would not be wrong and would, in my judgment, be right, if we are going to make a sale of this land, to provide in the law that authorizes the sale the method of the sale.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why change the statute in this particular case when we have been following this practice for many years?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman, then, this: Is there any general statute that gives to the commissioners or any other officers in the District the right to purchase other property or to trade property now belonging to the District for other property?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know of such a statute.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not, at least, any general law that will apply to that part of the bill. I think that is the most dangerous thing in this bill, to authorize the commissioners to trade for other property. We are going to set them up in the real estate business under the authority of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and furnish them a working capital to start with.

It seems to me that we could not under any circumstances stand for a principle of that kind, authorizing the commissioners to take property that now belongs to the Government and to say "You have the right, now, to trade that for other property," without specifying what the other property shall be, the kind of trade, or for what purpose it is going to be used, or anything—without any limitation whatever. I believe the bill ought to pass as the committee has introduced it in reference to the opening up of this street, but it is not necessary to confer upon the commissioners authority to make a trade of real estate and let them have the discretion to make any kind of a trade they want to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose they do open the street, what are you going to do with these two little parcels of property on either side of it?

Mr. NORRIS. If I was going to sell it, I would make the sale a public one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what we are going to do.

Mr. NORRIS. But you are going to authorize the commissioners to trade it for something else. They may trade it for automobiles or bicycles under this bill. Now, I do not think they will—I will admit that—but it is the principle, as I said, against which I make my protest. I do not question but that they would make as good a trade as they could. But their ideas as to what they could get for it in the way of real estate or where it should be located would be only ideas of individual men, and that ought to be done by authority of Congress, and no other way.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. This land was purchased for schools, in the first place. Does not the gentleman think it would be likely that the commissioners might be able to trade for another school site?

Mr. NORRIS. It may be.

Mr. MANN. And get a much better bargain in that way than by selling this property for cash and then purchasing the other site?

Mr. NORRIS. They may trade it for a gold mine, and that will make it unnecessary for the government of the District to ever levy taxes in the future. At the same time, that does not avoid the principle of the thing—of authorizing the commissioners to trade real estate belonging to the Government for other property and letting them decide what it shall be.

Mr. MANN. If they can decide what it shall be sold for, as many departments of the Government can, and we have any confidence in their judgment at all, and they may be able to get a better bargain by exchange, is it not wisdom to permit them to use that opportunity to get a better bargain?

Mr. NORRIS. If there is such a bargain, there is no reason why the commissioners should not report it here. If we are going to give that kind of an authorization it ought to be made with the full knowledge of all the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have not the slightest objection to an amendment to this bill giving the commissioners the right, in their discretion, to sell at private or public sale. We are all anxious to see the commissioners get out of this property all they can.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman accept an amendment which will provide that the commissioners may be given authority only to ascertain what can be done with the property and then report back to this House for further consideration?

Mr. MANN. They can not do anything of that kind; nobody would make a proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, Congress occupies a relation to this property analagous to that of a trustee to the property of his cestui que trust, or of a guardian to the property of his ward. In the vast majority of cases, before either a trustee or a guardian can sell the trust property he must first report to the county court the bargain which he desires to make and the amount that he can get for the property, and receive from the court an express authorization to make the sale. The amount in question does not at all affect the principle. It is immaterial whether it be 5,000 square feet or 5,000 square miles that are to be sold, the principle involved is identical.

This bill proposes to leave to three men authority to dispose of public property—real estate—at public or private sale, and upon any terms that they may elect to accept. What would the gentleman from Michigan think of a proposition to allow a guardian to dispose of the real estate of a ward at public or private sale in his discretion without first making a report to the court, so that the court might determine as to whether the reasonable value of the property was to be received and the interests of the ward properly protected?

Now, I do not question the integrity of the honorable gentlemen, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who, if the bill pass, would make this sale. But this is not a question of men. It is a question of the proper practice to pursue in selling public property. If it be true, as was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that this bill is in line with the precedents and practice of the Government in vogue for a long time, that fact does not prove that these ought to be observed any longer. This Congress, within my experience here, has overturned precedents which have stood for generations. When the attention of Congress has been brought to the fact that precedents should no longer be followed, Congress has not hesitated to disregard them.

I remember how in my own State a very important precedent of long standing was overthrown. Formerly in Wisconsin the Bible was read in the public schools. In the city of Edgerton suit was brought to enjoin this practice, and the court decided that the precedent, which had existed from the foundation of the State, was altogether wrong, and that the Bible must not be read in schools supported by public taxes. That case went to a Protestant supreme court, and the Protestant supreme court, in a unanimous opinion, sustained the lower court and overturned the established custom of forty years.

Now, if it be true that it has been customary for Congress to turn over to government officials the right to sell public land at public or private sale upon any terms to suit themselves and with no limitations as to price, then that is a precedent which ought at once to be overthrown, and I shall therefore vote against the bill as presented by the gentleman from Michigan.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives was also informed that the President had, on February 26, 1910, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 17531. An act to amend an act authorizing the Washington, Spa Springs and Gretta Railroad Company, of Maryland, to enter the District of Columbia, with amendments, approved February 18, 1907.

SETTING ASIDE CERTAIN LANDS FOR STREET PURPOSES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me the gentlemen who are opposing this bill can possibly have looked at the map. Of course it is impossible to furnish maps to each Member of the House so that they can all see it. This property was acquired by the United States in 1869. It was anticipated that it would be used for school purposes. It has never been utilized for school purposes, and there has never arisen any necessity for having a school there. It is not used for school purposes now, nor is it suitable for playgrounds connected with existing schools. The nearest school is 1,600 feet and the next nearest 4,000 feet away. The most of this particular piece of land lies in that part of Twentieth and Jackson streets which are projected and shown on the plans of these two streets, and the rest lies practically in two strips, one on the west side and the other on the east side of the portion of the plat in the proposed streets. These strips ought to be sold. Of course they can be retained. So far as I am concerned, I would be as willing that the United States should retain the land and not sell it at all; but not to pass this bill when it is necessary for the extension of these streets already projected, when the property has not been utilized at all by the Government or by the District, and to oppose its being used now for this necessary extension of the streets because the commissioners are allowed to sell two little side strips with very little value in their discretion——

Mr. GRAFF. What is the probable value?

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not know. One of them is a strip 11 feet wide and running as high as 24 feet, and the other very much less than that.

Mr. KAHN. Nine inches.

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not know any property in that region that is of any particular value, and practically no one wants it. In my opinion it would cost more to advertise this property and sell it at public sale than the entire value of the property. I hope this bill will pass exactly as it was drawn.

Mr. GRAFF. Can the gentleman give the approximate value of it?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think the extreme value of it would be about $1,500, and I think that is very high. It certainly can not be more than that. This bill was carefully considered. The subcommittee went up and looked at the property. I was not a member of that subcommittee, but they examined the property, and the committee had the engineer commissioner before them in regard to the matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to say it would cost more than the value of the property to advertise it. Did the gentleman say it was worth $1,500?

Mr. OLCOTT. Probably it would not cost that much to advertise the property, and I will withdraw that statement, but it would be much more economical to allow this to be sold at private sale than at public sale. It does not establish any precedent. It is simply that in the laying out of streets a little bit of property remains the title to which is in the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. I am reminded by one of our distinguished friends behind me of this thought, that perhaps, as the Government purchased the property for school purposes or for a specific purpose, there is a question whether it has a right to use that property for street puposes.

Mr. OLCOTT. I suppose that this is a change in the purpose for which this property was originally bought. It was purchased in 1869 and has never been used for the purpose for which it was originally acquired. I do not think there is any difficulty about that.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is whether they have a right to use it for this purpose.

Mr. OLCOTT. I think they have, and I think the gentleman will think so. It is a part of the highway plan——

Mr. MADDEN. Here is a point that may occur to the gentleman. If we have the right, of what advantage is it to the abutting property? This street is supposed to run through territory in which there is no street. The property adjoining the street wants it opened. It has now no access to the public street at all, and will of course derive a benefit from the opening of the street. Is there any justice in condemning public property to this use without assessing some benefit on the private property which is given such advantages?

Mr. OLCOTT. The benefits are going to be assessed on the adjoining property, as is the case in the opening of all streets.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill does not so provide.

Mr. OLCOTT. This bill does not so provide, because this is not a bill to extend the street. We have already agreed to make the street through our own property in accordance with a permanent system of street extension.

Mr. MADDEN. What benefit is the Government of the United States getting out of it?

Mr. OLCOTT. The city of Washington gets a great benefit by having its plans for street opening continued and completed.

Mr. MADDEN. What compensation does the Government of the United States get for property which it dedicates for street purposes?

Mr. OLCOTT. They are taking their own property.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand they are taking their own property; but of what advantage is it to the adjoining property? Does the gentleman wish the House to understand that the Government of the United States will go into the market and buy a large tract of property——

Mr. OLCOTT. For which they paid $240.

Mr. MADDEN. No matter whether they paid anything for it or not. That was in 1869. It may be worth $240,000 now.

Mr. OLCOTT. But the Government has already adopted plans for cutting streets through this particular piece of property.

Mr. MANN. The commissioners adopted a plan.

Mr. MADDEN. The commissioners suggested a plan.

Mr. OLCOTT. They had authority from us to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. The plan will not be adopted until we pass this bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. The plan has been adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand that it has. But now let me assume that the Government owns this tract of land for which it only paid $240 in 1869, and then let us assume that since 1869 the value of this land has increased materially until today it is worth, it may be, $240,000.

Mr. OLCOTT. It is not, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. We are going to give this property to the public here.

Mr. OLCOTT. We are going to open a street that has been approved of in accordance with a statute passed by us, and the benefits of that street will be assessed against the adjoining property abutting the street.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that include the payment for the ground?

Mr. OLCOTT. In this particular case it does not.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the District of Columbia should buy ground for school purposes and then dedicate it for street purposes without receiving any compensation from the people who own the property which is enhanced in value by the opening of a street? Does the gentleman think a report from a committee having jurisdiction over this matter recommending that kind of a transaction ought to be adopted by Congress?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think this report ought to be adopted by Congress; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it a wise recommendation?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think it is a wise recommendation, and I think if the gentleman had looked at the map and had gone up there and seen the property he would have thought so, too.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not a question of a map; it is a question of what the Government owns, whether it wants to dispose of it, whether we are violating a principle that ought not to be violated, whether we are giving property for a public street that ought to be used for public schools, whether we are receiving anything in return for the property we are giving, and whether the property that is benefited by opening the street upon which this property is dedicated ought not to pay for the benefits which they derive from it.

Mr. OLCOTT. The property was taken for school purposes and abandoned because it was useless for that purpose. It has been held since 1869, and is absolutely useless for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman one further question. Suppose the gentleman owned this property, and suppose the Government was going to take the property owned by the gentleman; would not he expect compensation from the Government for the property so taken?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly I would.

Mr. MADDEN. How would the gentleman get it?

Mr. OLCOTT. It would be assessed on the adjoining owners, and the value of the assessment would be determined by the jury.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman puts himself in a different attitude than he would put the Government. The Government is not going to get anything for the property which it dedicates. I understood the gentleman to say that the Government would not get anything.

Mr. OLCOTT. They will not get it, because it is theirs. If I had a large area of property and had made up my mind that I was going to build a barn on one part of it, and I changed my mind and wanted to make a road through it, it never would occur to me that I was doing any serious damage or injury to myself for changing my plans, nor do I think the United States Government, owning this large area in the District of Columbia, and the United States being in partnership, are going to do any great harm or damage, having bought this land for school purposes, now make it useful for some other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's statement is inconsistent. The gentleman said that if he owned a large tract of land and was going to put a street through it, to open up a street for the benefit and advantage of a part of the property, he would not think he was making any sacrifice by opening the street; then he said if the Government, owning a large tract of land, put the street through, it ought not to receive any revenue in return for the dedication of the land, even though it owned no land on the other side or around the part dedicated.

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman from Illinois seems to forget or ignore the fact that this is beneficial to the District of Columbia. The change of the particular use that was originally intended for this particular property is for the benefit of the District. The gentleman will understand that this property is at the junction of two streets, which has been determined by the commissioners under authority given them by Congress; it is in the intersection of those streets. If they build a schoolhouse on the street the schoolhouse would have to come down in order to carry out the plan, or else they would have to make irregular streets around the land. Since 1869 the District Commissioners have had authority to build a schoolhouse there. They have always believed that it would be a foolish thing to do, and so they have not built it.

We have got some property that is not doing us any good. We can not sell the property to private individuals because it is on the line of street improvements, and we want to utilize something without any expense to ourselves. The improvement itself will be paid by the abutting property owners, and we come to you and say, Will you not give us authority to sell two little irregular strips to those who will buy them? I do not care whether it is sold at public or private sale, but I do believe in this case, with so little money involved, it would be idle for us to sit here and tie the hands of the commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MADDEN. But you do more than that. In the first place, you take all the property that is owned by the District in that neighborhood and you dedicate it to street purposes.

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly. We take this property.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman willing to admit that you take all the property that is used for the streets that belongs to the Government, except these two strips?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not that so?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to know is how much the Government gets for the property.

Mr. OLCOTT. For the actual fee of the land they now own?

Mr. MADDEN. For the land which is used for street purposes. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. OLCOTT. These streets, except for this particular piece, are already opened.

Mr. MADDEN. The streets are opened?

Mr. OLCOTT. These streets are opened, with the exception of this particular piece that we are talking about now. We are trying to complete the street.

Mr. MADDEN. And we intended to build schools on this property originally?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; we intended to and found it unwise to so utilize the property.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we should sell the entire 20,000 or 25,000 feet of ground. Would we get any more for it than we would for the 5,000 feet?

Mr. OLCOTT. Nobody would buy it because they could not erect anything on it, because it is in the line of the streets already opened. They could not use it at all; they could not erect anything on it.

Mr. MANN. There is no law of the District or any other law that would prevent them from erecting something upon it.

Mr. OLCOTT. No; but we would have to commence condemnation proceedings before we could get it back.

Mr. MANN. And then we would get the money, would we not, in the first place? The property owners who were benefited would pay for the opening of the street. That is the difference.

Mr. OLCOTT. I have no doubt the money we would get would be inadequate to pay for the condemnation proceedings.

Mr. MANN. That may be. We have not had that explained to us, as to what it is worth.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I want to find out, whether we are getting anything for it.

Mr. OLCOTT. We are utilizing some property that is not worth anything now.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to have the House understand that this property which was bought in 1869 at Twentieth and Jackson streets is not worth anything?

Mr. OLCOTT. I mean to say it is not worth anything to any private individual to buy it.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that these two strips are worth $1,500.

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, I said that. I do not know really, but I think they could not be worth any more than that. They are irregular strips.

Mr. MADDEN. If they are worth that, then how much more would the other 20,000 feet be worth?

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman can make that calculation as easily as I can.

Mr. MADDEN. It must be worth $20,000 an acre there, according to the way property is being sold. There is at least half an acre of land there. We have 25,000 feet of ground, and there are about 42,500 feet of ground in an acre. That is more than half an acre, and the land is certainly worth more than $20,000 an acre. What are we going to do—give it away?

Mr. OLCOTT. No.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what we are going to do.

Mr. OLCOTT. We are using it for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are using it for street purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Who gets the benefit of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The public does, just the same as in any other street.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the property abutting this street enhanced in value?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose the whole section will be enhanced in value if these streets are opened up.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not pay a cent to the Government when the land is dedicated, do they?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The abutting property pays nothing whatever into the Federal Treasury when the land is dedicated, does it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; they pay only for the opening of it.

Mr. MADDEN. If you owned the property, they would pay you something for it; then why should not they pay the Government?

Mr. OLCOTT. For the simple reason that we are benefiting ourselves; because the Government of the United States is being benefited by the extension of these streets; that is the reason.

Mr. MADDEN. That is no argument at all.

Mr. OLCOTT. It is certainly a benefit to the city of Washington and the District of Columbia to have these streets opened and cared for. We have a right to have our property improved with yours or any individual's property.

Mr. MADDEN. If we owned a large tract of property on each side of the street, I can see the gentleman's logic.

Mr. OLCOTT. We own property on either side of the street, and it is a regular thing——

Mr. MADDEN. But where we own nothing on either side of the street which is to be improved by the opening of the street, we ought not to dedicate this property free of cost to the people who do own property on both sides of the street.

Mr. OLCOTT. Would the gentleman answer this question? Would he suggest a way to do this? Would he sell this property first at private sale and then proceed to condemn it?

Mr. MADDEN. If I was going to sell the property at all, I would sell it before I opened the street.

Mr. OLCOTT. And then buy it back again?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I would not buy it back again. The man owning abutting property would certainly have to pay his part. I would not pay for it all out of the Public Treasury, anyway.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 30, noes 42.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. MADDEN) reported that there were—ayes 43, noes 67.

So the committee refused to lay aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report back the separate bills as amended.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the Chair to say this measure was laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so state; the Chair decided that the measure was refused consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And the bill reverts to the calendar.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20164), and had directed him to report the same with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, may I ask the gentleman whether he expects to go ahead with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, we hope to finish the general debate on this bill this afternoon, but the reading of the bill will not be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] use some of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain remarks affecting the recent salary increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, during the last session of the Fifty-ninth Congress an amendment was adopted to the legislative appropriation bill by which the salaries of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress was fixed at $7,500 per annum on and after March 4, 1907. This action was taken in January, 1907. Previous to that time the salary had, for a number of years, been $5,000. The vote on this question was not a party vote, and a large majority of the members of both Houses, Democrats as well as Republicans, finally voted for the increase. The press of the country, without regard to party, generally and heartily approved it, and the people generally in all sections and of all parties approved it, and of the many members of both Houses who voted for it no one of them, in any part of the country, has been defeated by his constituency because of that vote. Indeed, so far as I have been able to learn, about the only instance in which the vote of a Member for it has been urged as a reason for his defeat was in the case of the late Hon. J. M. Griggs, of the second Georgia district, whose opponent for the Democratic nomination in 1908 assailed him for voting for it, with the result that Mr. Griggs was returned to Congress with the overwhelming indorsement of his constituents. On roll call I voted, on December 14, 1906, for an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill, the effect of which amendment was to fix the salary to be paid Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress at $7,500 per annum, on and after March 4, 1909. This amendment was lost by a vote of—yeas 106, nays 190. This amendment being defeated, the matter was again brought to the attention of the House on January 18, 1907, during the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. One of the Senate amendments to that bill had increased the salary of the Vice-President and of the Speaker of the House. When this Senate amendment came to be considered by the House, Mr. Littauer, of New York, moved to concur in the Senate amendment, with a House amendment, fixing the salary of Members of Congress at $7,500 per annum from March 4, 1907, when the life of the next, or the Sixtieth, Congress would begin. There was no record vote on this proposition, which passed the House by a vote of 133 to 92, was concurred in by the Senate, and approved by the President, and thus became the law. While there is no record of the vote, yet I willingly state that I supported the motion and voted therefor.

The criticism aimed at those of us who so voted is usually couched in about these words: "He voted to increase his own salary as a Member of Congress." While this is not an untruthful statement of the question, it is a most disingenuous one, and either purposely or ignorantly states the question in a misleading manner, in that it seeks to convey the impression that the Members of Congress who voted the increase acted in some unusual and particularly odious manner in order to increase their compensation. Now, what is the truth about that? Article I, section 6, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

Senators and Representatives in Congress shall receive a compensation for their services to be ascertained by the law.

What other body except Congress has any authority to make the laws of the United States, and by what other authority except by that of Congress could these salaries be fixed at all? It seems to me that these questions answer themselves. Whenever congressional salaries are to be raised or lowered or paid at all Congress, and Congress alone, can do it. The First Congress of the United States fixed the compensation of its Members, and after they had all been elected, and every succeeding Congress from that day to this has, once a year, fixed the compensation of its Members in the annual legislative appropriation bill. According to my investigations, there have been some four or five changes in the congressional salary since the establishment of the Government, all of them except one being increases, and in each instance Congress has, as a matter of course and of necessity, made the change. Nobody else had the power to do it. The suggestion may be made that in changing the salary Congress ought to have postponed the date on which the increase in pay was to begin until March 4, 1909, as was provided in the first amendment submitted, and that if this had been done Members would not have been called upon to vote for an increased compensation to be paid to the Members of a Congress to which they had already been elected, but whose term of service had not then begun.

I freely admit that, looking at this matter from the standpoint of the House alone, that view of it appealed to me very strongly, and I did not hesitate to so express myself in a speech I made in the House on December 14, 1906, when the first amendment was being considered. If the question be viewed from the standpoint of the House alone, that undoubtedly would have been the best course, but when you remember that the Senate as well as the House had to act on this question, and when you recall that while the Members of the House are elected for a term of two years only, the Senators are elected for six-year terms, and that only one-third of the Senate terms expire every two years, then you can see how impossible it was to adopt that plan, for the House could not expect the Senate to put itself in a different position from that of the House. If at any time a change in the congressional salary, whether it is to be raised or lowered, is desirable or necessary, and such change ought not to be made unless it shall take effect at some time when it will not affect the compensation to be paid any Representative or Senator during a term for which he has already been elected, what sort of a condition would we be in? Whenever Congress wished to change the salary it would have to postpone the time at which such change should take effect to such a far distant period in the future that by the time that period arrived the necessity for the change might no longer exist, conditions that had rendered it desirable might have entirely changed, or the evils sought to be cured might have been immensely aggravated or rendered incurable by delay. In the meantime, in order to avoid personal criticism, Congress would not only have failed to exercise a plain constitutional power, but its Members would have shirked a public duty, for I intend to show you to-day that this question does not so much involve private interests as it does the most important public interests. Congress having the plain right, not only constitutionally but morally, to make this increase, and to make it in the manner it was made, if it was expedient and right to make it at all, this brings us down to the plain question, Was it right to increase the salary?

Permit me, as a man who has had actual, practical experience on this question, to say that I know we made no mistake in increasing the salary, and that no matter who may come to the next Congress, whether it be myself or anyone else, he will find it difficult enough to get along on the present salary, as he would have found it impossible to come out even on the old salary, if he is a man of no wealth and without other resources except the salary.

This statement may seem almost incredible to many of the people whose earnings are not large but whose expenses are small. To many men, who do not stop to consider that whether a man's pay is really large or not depends to a great extent upon what the demands upon him are, it will doubtless seem that a salary of $5,000 is a princely stipend with which even the most greedy avarice ought to be content, and these men will doubtless be encouraged in that belief by gentlemen who hope to get their votes thereby, for I know of no question that offers such fruitful and promising regards to demagoguery as a question like this, in which the opportunity offers itself to an ambitious politician to go to the poor but honest man who makes but a small wage or has but a small income and say, "We were paying our Congressman $5,000 a year, and he did not think even that was enough." Still, in my judgment, Congress made no mistake in making this increase, if men without wealth are to remain in congressional life. If a Member of Congress could stay at home all the time, the salary of $5,000 would have been enough; but when you remember that we have to stay in Washington almost half of the time, and that our expenses in that great city are extremely heavy, I do not hesitate to assert, from hard experience, that it is almost, if not quite, impossible for any poor man who is honest to do justice to his family and to his constituency, pay his expenses in Washington, and meet his obligations at home and in the district on the salary of $5,000. Let me tell you, also, that even at the present salary there is not a lawyer or a doctor or a business man in any one of the smaller towns of our district who makes as much as $2,500 or $3,000 a year who has not got a better job, from a financial standpoint, than a Member of Congress.

Oh, but it is suggested, "some other man is willing to take the job at the old salary and thinks that it is enough. He is willing and anxious to serve at a cheaper salary," so he might say, and so he might be. As far as that is concerned he might be willing to take the Presidency at the same salary. But is that any good reason why he should be elected either to Congress or to the Presidency? On the contrary, it seems to me to be an exceedingly strong reason why he should not. And let me say here that if the office is to be given to the man who favors the lowest salary, there will doubtless be a stirring competition among the demagogues of the country, and I doubt not that some might be willing to take it for a thousand dollars a year. So far as I am concerned, I refuse to enter into such competition; I think the present salary is by no means excessive, and I stand on my vote in favor of the increase. I do not believe in cheap labor of any sort, physical or mental. I have never believed that there was any real economy in cheap labor, or that the best results could be obtained from it. I do not believe in cheap carpenters, cheap mechanics, cheap railroad men, or cheap farmers. I do not believe in cheap lawyers or in cheap doctors. I most certainly do not believe in cheap Congressmen. It seems to me that when the American people send men to Congress who must spend almost a billion dollars a year to support this great Government of ours, and who must necessarily provide the money by taxation to meet these enormous expenses, and who are constantly passing on important questions that involve the happiness and prosperity of 90,000,000 of people, that it is the poorest of all so-called economy and the most shortsighted of all policies to do a little cheeseparing in the matter of their salaries. There is hardly a business or a profession in these days that does not offer to those who succeed in it financial reward incomparably greater than attends even the highest political success. While financial reward is never the chief incentive nor even a consideration of the first importance to men who love the public service and are qualified to adorn it, yet it is my judgment that it would be the most shortsighted and mistaken policy for us not to offer a compensation for congressional service sufficiently adequate to at least permit men of the highest capacity and character to devote themselves to it.

Take the district I represent; there are a great many lawyers and doctors and hundreds of business men in every line there who make more than the salary paid its Congressman, and who could not and would not accept the place. On this subject let me quote the words of a distinguished Georgian long since gone to his reward and long since awarded his proper place in the Valhalla of Georgia's illustrious and immortal dead. I refer to Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, who represented for many years with distinction and credit both to himself and to his constituency the district I now represent. While Mr. Stephens was a Member of Congress, after the war, the question came up whether the salary of Members of Congress, then fixed at $7,500, should be reduced to $5,000—exactly the question I am discussing now. Mr. Stephens both voted and spoke for the $7,500 salary. I quote from his speech of December 11, 1873, in the House of Representatives:

> This brings me to the second view which I propose to present to the House. I am not going to state what I deem my services here worth, but I do intend to state what I think the services of a Representative of any people in any district in the United States ought to be worth, and perhaps I will go far above the figure of any law which has ever been passed upon the subject. I will say this: That Representatives in this House ought to be men of that mental caliber, that moral caliber, that information, that education, that virtue, of that trustworthiness, of all the qualities that make men fit for the highest pursuits of life. The Representative ought to be of that character which would entitle him to the highest amount of wages, if you choose to call it so, which is given to the highest grade of skilled labor in the country. There are, Mr. Speaker, various kinds of labor, skilled and unskilled, and there are various kinds of power—water power, steam power, muscle, and mind or brain power.
> My standard of wages for a Member of this House would be that amount which the higher grades of skilled labor, combined with brain power and virtue, usually commands. And I am satisfied that when the people of this country understand the nature of the duties and the proper character of a Member of Congress, when they understand the importance of government, and the good government, and wise government, there are none throughout the length and breadth of the country who will dispute this proposition.
> Why, sir, the salaries of managers of railroads reach $25,000. There is hardly a master mechanic in any of the machine shops who does not receive $10,000 as a compensation for his skilled labor, his brain labor. There is hardly a town in which there are not merchants who make from $10,000 to $15,000. There is hardly a district in the United States, I suspect, where there are not one or more lawyers whose incomes are as much as $10,000 or $15,000. There is hardly any place or district where the most eminent physicians do not make $10,000 or $15,000. There is hardly any business of life requiring labor or brain labor which does not command that compensation; the income of many journalists greatly exceeds it.
> Now, sir, when you teach the people what government is, the science of government, the nature of the duties of a Member of Congress, the interest that everybody in the community feels and every member of society has in good government, in the laws we pass here within the sphere of federal limited power, touching more or less the interest and the pocket of the humblest human being within the jurisdiction of these States, they will say that legislation should be in the hands of men of character, of virtue, and integrity, who understand their duties, men who understand the science of government. This requires study, this requires labor, it requires an immense deal of thought; and therefore if the Government is maintained rightly in the Senate and in the House the rule of fixing the pay under the Constitution should be such as to afford an arena in these halls for the virtue and talents of the highest grade in our country.
> Some sham, would-be leader of the people may go to the poor man driving the plane or the plow and tell him he is getting only a pittance for his daily toil, while a Member of Congress is getting $16 a day; and he may induce that man, in the humblest but honest walks of life, to vote for him on his promise to reduce the pay. But that man, if he were ill, would send for a skilled physician in preference to a quack, though the former was making twice as much as the latter. So with the other learned professions; and when the people properly understand the importance of good legislation they will have as little use for a cheap Congressman as for a cheap doctor or a cheap lawyer.

Let me quote again from the same speech. Mr. Stephens also said:

> The Government in all its departments should offer fair competition for the highest virtue and intelligence with all the other vocations in life. The youth of the country in selecting pursuits should not be driven from the political field for want of those inducements offered by other kinds of employment. The political arena, with just compensation, affords the broadest, widest, and grandest field for intellectual action. With that view it is necessary that the Government should offer the highest inducements to skilled and brain labor in all its departments. * * * A young man comes from college. His father has toiled, and even his mother, spending their earnings—I know of many such cases—and using their means to educate their boy; and when he comes out of college their object is that he shall get into some business, something that will repay their sacrifices. Such young men, Mr. Speaker, do not, of course, come into this field. As long as the law offers a better opening they will go to the law. If mercantile business offers a better opening they will go there. If the profession of medicine offers a better opening they will go into that. At present the mania is for engineering, in connection with railroads and otherwise. Speak to them about studying government, and they will tell you that they can not afford to go at that. Why, sir, in my own district I have known men with families to provide for who never could think of coming to Congress. They were among the ablest intellects in the district; but they could not think of leaving their more profitable business, when living was really a vital question. Their means were not sufficient to support them.

So spoke Georgia's great commoner, while serving as a Representative in Congress in 1873. His words were those of a wise and able statesman, who had the confidence and love of his people and who did not hesitate to speak out plainly on this question upon which long years of brilliant congressional service had so well qualified him to speak. His words of wisdom and of statesmanship come to us, as it were, from the grave.

One other suggestion and then I will have done with the discussion of the merits of this question. There are some countries in which no salary at all is paid to members of the legislative body. For instance, in the British House of Commons members receive no compensation whatever. And what has been the result? The House of Commons is made up almost entirely of rich men and members of the English aristocracy, who control its proceedings. The only exceptions to this rule are the representatives of organized labor. They are the only poor men there, and they have to be supported by voluntary contributions from their brethren, taken up in union meetings all over Great Britain. If we are to have no congressional salary in America, or an inadequate one, it will be utterly impossible for poor men to go to Congress or, if once elected, to remain there. The result will be that Congress will be controlled by rich men or by grafters, or by a combination of both, for no poor man who is honest will be able to either become or remain a Member. If this happens what protection will the masses have against class legislation and against the granting of all sorts of special privileges to the wealthy and the powerful, to the hurt and injury of the poor and the weak? God knows the situation is bad enough as it is, but it would be infinitely worse if a condition existed which would tend to drive from congressional service everybody except rich or dishonest men.

Many of our very ablest and purest men are poor, but they ought to have the opportunity to enter and to remain in public service. Many of them now adorn the public service and many others are qualified to do so. The people need their services and are entitled to them. I will never, by voice or vote, close the door of opportunity upon them. In voting for adequate compensation for Members of Congress I did not listen to the voice of personal interest or selfish motive, but voted in the interests of the whole people and of my own constituency and especially of every poor boy in our land, who may develop the necessary talent for high public office, without either inheriting or acquiring wealth.

While I have discussed the merits of this question fully, and have, I hope, shown that I am right about it, yet I now wish to call attention to certain facts that will show that all the criticism recently heard of me, on this question, is both belated and selfish, and therefore worthless. It will be recalled that I cast the votes that are criticised on December 14, 1906, and on January 18, 1907. The last of these votes was not a record vote, but it was given complete publicity, with my entire approval, in almost every newspaper in Georgia, and almost without exception our press warmly approved and applauded that vote. Not only that, but when the short session of Congress adjourned on March 4, 1907, I came home and made several speeches in my district, giving my constituents an account of my stewardship. One of these speeches I particularly recall. It was delivered at the April term, 1907, of Lincoln superior court, Senator CLAY speaking with me. In that speech I went fully into the question of my vote for the salary increase, giving, as nearly as I can remember, about the same reasons for it I have given to-day. So far as I could judge from the manifestations and expressions of my audience, those of my constituents who were present and heard me approved of my action. Certainly there was no expression, public or private, to the contrary. I merely mention these facts to remind you that there was the utmost publicity and openness about my vote, both at Washington and in Georgia, at the time it was cast and afterwards. In June, 1908, with full knowledge of the vote, and with every evidence of approval thereof, the people of the district I represent unanimously renominated me for Congress, and at our congressional convention, held during the same month at Augusta, Ga., heartily and enthusiastically approved my record as a Member of Congress. Where were the gentlemen then who now so vociferously criticise me about this matter, and are so unjust and hasty in ascribing unworthy and selfish motives to me? Which one of them raised a voice in protest or in criticism while I was submitting my candidacy to our people in 1908? Why were they silent then? Were they less intelligent then than now, or less patriotic, or less disinterested? Can the remarkable change in them from approval, or, at least, acquiescence, in 1908, to violent and unjust criticism in 1910 be ascribed to a growth in virtue, in patriotism, or intelligence? Ought it not rather be ascribed to a new born and then undeveloped thirst for the office I hold, and valued accordingly? These are questions which the people of the tenth district ought to consider and must decide. The demagoguery of such an attack ought to be patent to every fair-minded man, and I can not believe that a great and intelligent constituency will fail to plainly perceive it. Which one of the gentlemen who now demagogues about this matter will refuse to take the increased salary if elected?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of the debate on this bill I suggested that possibly I might, before its close, have some remarks to make not only upon the bill, but upon other and kindred subjects. I have no manuscript or prepared speech, but I hope the dignity of my audience will not suffer on this account, as I have given some thought to the questions I desire to discuss. While I should be pleased to be in a position where I could present to the House an orderly, consecutive, and logical argument upon this great measure, the measure itself is of such character, so varied in all of its details, that such a course would be impossible, covering even partially the field of debate. However, before speaking to a few sections of the bill, and then passing to the consideration of other questions, I feel, as a representative of the minority upon this committee, that the thanks not only of the committee but of the House of Representatives are due the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], the chairman of the committee, who has so successfully and ably managed the preparation and presentation of this bill to the House. Without partisanship, with a profound interest in the welfare of the country, and a sincere desire upon his part, I believe, to economize, he has done all within his power to bring this great bill within proper limitations.

It is the greatest bill, perhaps, in the amount involved that has ever been presented for any one department of the Government in any country of the civilized world. Ten years ago the Post-Office Committee presented to the country a bill that carried some $89,000,000. In the last Congress and this one the measure runs to some two hundred and thirty-odd millions of dollars. We naturally pause and ask ourselves the question whether in the decade that has passed there has been such growth in population and in the business of this great department as to justify an increase from $89,000,000 to two hundred and thirty-odd millions of dollars in the administration of this department of the Government?

I am not here to criticise this administration. I have watched item after item under this bill, and consulted the laws under which the estimates have been presented by the department for consideration. If there has been an absence of economy, it is due, in my judgment, not to the committee—perhaps not wholly to the administration of the department—but to the unscientific and unbusinesslike methods and unwise laws controlling the Post-Office Department. Every business has advanced by the perfection of details looking to the accomplishment of satisfactory results except this business. Profits and losses may be accurately determined in every line of trade and every business relation save in this greatest department of business known to-day to the American public. The Post-Office Department is operating under laws by no means suited to modern business affairs. Experts tell us that under our methods of accounting in this department that a correct balance sheet can not be obtained from the officers charged with the administration of its affairs. All else in the business world has advanced but the postal affairs of the United States. The main and essential features of the department have been improved in many ways, yet it has remained practically unprogressive. Would you think it probable that under our legalized method of computation of inland railway mail pay that no human being could come within $15,000,000 of the fair and legitimate cost of transportation of the American inland mail, and yet this is a practically conceded fact? Is not Congress to blame for such a condition? We are told that the department pays for the transportation of mail so many millions of dollars. We all readily understand that. We are told that the mail is weighed for a certain period of time. We all understand that.

But the mysterious factor in the method of computation is this: The uncertainty of an accurate result rests in the fact that we have no way of ascertaining with accuracy the amount of mail that is carried in the United States annually. We weigh the mail in one of the four grand divisions of the United States once in four years. The time of weighing is short and date uncertain. The weight in one section is made the basis of computation for four years' weighing and pay. Whether the mails increase or whether the mails decrease or what the conditions are looking toward increase during the weighing period and a decrease during the period that the mails are not weighed we do not know. We go on from year to year making these appropriations in the dark. The railroads say that they are not fully compensated. They tell us that while the actual cost of the transportation of the mail may be at a fixed figure per ton per mile, that their compensation, in marshaling all the factors and elements that enter into the determination of the compensation, is less than 5 cents per pound; that the remainder of the cost is in the handling. The short-line railroads claim that their compensation is entirely inadequate. The long-line roads say that their compensation is no greater than it ought to be.

I have not the time nor the figures before me to review the contention of the railroad companies of the United States on this question. But it is apparent that the short-line railroads, by reason of the method of computation of the pay, in the fact that they only have a short haul, and the expense attending the care and control of the mails is as great almost as for a long haul, have some justification for the contention that they are not under the present system fully paid. But when you remember the uncertainty of the method of computation as compared with the short as well as the long haul, we are left in doubt and uncertainty upon both of these propositions.

Shall we continue a situation of this character? Shall an administration be enforced that can produce no more of accuracy in results than this from year to year?

We have in connection with the mail service the full railway post-office cars; cars the rental of which cost the Government from five to six thousand dollars each per annum; cars that have a life of from 10 to 16 years; cars that can be constructed for the amount almost of one year's rental. We have the compartment cars, and we have the mail thrown in the cars and delivered by the railroad men from station to station, where there are no railway-mail clerks. Those who have investigated, those who have made the computation, have suggested to us another method, one at least by which we could accurately ascertain what compensation ought to be paid.

No honest man wants to make the railroads carry the mail of the United States for less than it is worth to carry it, and no honest man wants to pay them more than it is worth to carry it. To ascertain the truth is our dilemma. We ought to have a system under which the exact truth can be ascertained, whether it results in greater or less compensation for carrying our mails. I am much inclined to favor the idea that economic results would follow if we should abandon our present method and pay only a fair price for the space that our mail occupies in the ordinary cars for transportation of the mail per mile per annum and for use of space in compartment cars. This at least will bring to us accurate results as to the just measure of compensation. And while I do not believe in government ownership of railroads, while I do not believe for one moment in destroying the legitimate power and the influence of the private citizen in the business affairs of this country, while I oppose the Government of the United States interfering in the business affairs and private relations of the people, yet, under the Constitution of our country, the Post-Office Department of the United States is entitled to and of right ought to exercise a monopoly of all the mails in the interest of all the people; and in order that that result may be accomplished with the least expense to the American people, I believe we ought to own and run every postal car in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if our Government means anything it means a government of equality of rights. It means "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." If it shall amount to anything, it must exercise to its full extent the powers conferred upon the federal institution by the Constitution of the United States. Economy in administration is an essential principle of a free republic.

If there be no economy, there must be an inequality and injustice. If there be no economy in the administration of our affairs, the wealth of the people of necessity is absorbed in maladministration. Let this Government undertake to enforce the business of this department in obedience to the organic law. What right has any express company or common carrier, existing under the law of the land, to undertake to carry the mails of the United States, to participate in this service without the consent of Congress?

This monopoly belongs to the people. It ought to be rigidly enforced and exercised. The Government ought to determine what is mail matter. It ought to carry it, and it ought to permit none other to carry it without its consent. If it sees fit to turn over the carrying of the mails, as it must of necessity do, at least so far as payment for wheelage is concerned, to the common carriers, it must pay the legitimate compensation, and it ought not to pay more.

And now let us come back for a moment to that question of compensation. As I have remarked, it is in doubt. But there is one significant fact which should challenge the attention of legislators. The express companies of the United States will carry the mails, and they will deliver the mails; perhaps not in the same advantageous way that the delivery is made by the government officials, but they will bear the great burden of the expense of transportation and handling for about one-fourth of the sum which the railroads demand. If the express companies can pay to the railroad companies for wheelage of their cars 45 per cent of their gross earnings, can not the Government of the United States profit by the ownership of these mail cars and pay the same measure in money for wheelage that is paid by the express companies? It looks to me like a feasible, reasonable, business proposition.

We are told that the Government of the United States ought not to administer the affairs of the Post-Office Deparment for a profit. They tell us that there is no profit in the appropriations for the army, for the navy, or for that great domestic concern which we call the Department of the Interior, or the Department of Justice, or the Department of Agriculture. These great departments administer certain functions of the executive branch of our Government. They have no means of making revenue. There stand your army and your navy, both for national defense. There is the Department of Justice for the maintenance of federal justice. There is the Department of Agriculture looking to the welfare of the farms and the fields. There is the Department of Commerce and Labor overlooking the business and laboring interests of your country. There is the great Interior Department concerned with your internal affairs. But this great Post-Office Department is unlike them all. It is the business institution of your country. Shall you not run a business institution for the purpose of obtaining the revenue at least necessary to administer it? Can you throw away the only opportunity that you have in the distribution of the departments of your Government to make the money that is necessary to conduct one of them? I have no sympathy with the suggestion that we ought not to practice rigid economy, save, and make every dollar that can legitimately be made in the Post-Office Department. Why not? The very manner in which it was established, the very power of the Constitution that called it into existence, presupposes that fact. It gave to the department a monopoly of the greatest business in the world in order that the American people as one people might have the benefits of that monopoly.

How are we, then, to administer these affairs for the benefit of the people unless it be done wisely, economically, and profitably? Now and then some separate question affecting the affairs of this department is presented to us, and solution is demanded. We are to-day confronted with a proposition in reference to the second-class mail matter of the United States. It stands alone. It is separate. It is distinct in its appeals for solution from any and every other question affecting the Government. Keep in mind the fact that the post-office is a constitutional monopoly. You will find that the Congress, in establishing this department, exercised the power of that monopoly in another direction for the interest and welfare of the people; not merely a monopoly for the accumulation of the means to administer the Government, but the power of monopoly was to be converted, in the judgment of the Congress, to the welfare and interest of the American people. In fixing, therefore, the rate of postage, they fixed 32 cents per pound upon letters or mail matter of the first class, 8 and 16 cents, respectively, on third and fourth class; but when it came to the second-class matter, there was fixed but 1 cent per pound. Why this discrimination? It is apparent to every man that the relative rates are such that if money must be made upon one, and if compensation alone comes from another, loss must come from that part of the pay on the class that is so low that it is impossible to be compensatory in its nature. Why was the loss deliberately fixed upon second-class matter? The fundamental doctrine of monopoly, which in our institutions is applicable alone to this department, was invoked. It was desired that the benefits should be given to the people of the United States in the dissemination of knowledge and information.

It was believed that the great papers of the country, the weeklies and dailies and other publications, were of more value to the people as a means of education, as a means of the preservation of those great principles of government which are so dear to the hearts of the American people that we could afford to lose upon that class of matter. It is a loss. It is a great loss. I am utterly surprised that gentlemen engaged in that line of publication, the editors of great papers, should insist by any possible system of computation, any method of juggling with figures, that anything but a loss can be figured to the Government of the United States upon second-class matter. Why apologize for it? Why undertake to say that the second-class matter produces a large amount of first-class, third-class, and fourth-class matter, and therefore the rate is justified because of its production of revenue under other lines? The argument is fallacious. By the same reasoning and the same logic you may say that third and fourth class matter produces first-class matter; that first, third, and fourth produce second-class matter, and therefore one is of greater advantage than the other. It is impossible to determine the line of demarcation in the production of postal revenue for the people by the different classes of matter, and it is a false ground upon which to place it. Let us stand up before our educational interests and say that this monopoly of the Post-Office Department may and shall be used for the benefit of the American people; that it is to the benefit of the American people to disseminate knowledge and information, that it may go down to the masses of the people that they may know what their Government is doing, that they may know whether the trend of events is in behalf of liberty or of tyranny. Let there be no apology for the exercise of this power in the interest of the press, in the interest of free speech, and free government. [Applause.] I desire to offer to this House no illogical position upon a proposition so sound as that.

But let us not forget the purposes that were intended. Shall it be said that this beneficent purpose shall be perverted? Shall publications that are merely advertising sheets, that contain one-half or more of advertisements and the remainder fiction that teaches nothing of value to the people, shall they fall in the category of the protected press? That is the question that you must consider. There is the line of cleavage; there you strike down the false that the true may live.

I am satisfied that not only the people but Congress understands the delicacy of that situation. It would take more than an ordinary judgment, more than an ordinary discretion, to frame a law that will maintain this principle and policy for the education of the people and yet preserve that principle from the insidious assaults of those engaged in mere commercial pursuits. We can trust to Congress, in its good time, to reach that solution. Let us only keep in view the great fundamental question and policy that underlies the proposition before us and its solution will come in justice at last.

We are again told that we are not paying the officers of the Government all that they ought to be paid; that there ought to be an increase of salaries. You are told that you raised your own salary; why not raise the salaries of all the other employees of the Government? There is a difference in the nature of public service and of public responsibility, and yet I am not inclined to say to the man engaged in the service of this Government in this department that if you are not satisfied with your salary, you can leave your position and another can take it.

But I am satisfied to say to him that while you ought to have under all circumstances and conditions remuneration for your service, pay commensurate with the labor that you perform for the people, your pay already is enough in most instances, and you ought not to persist and demand by organization and otherwise an increase of compensation, at least until the Federal Treasury is plethoric again and a proper readjustment of all salaries is made.

The committee has not undertaken to raise the salaries of the postal officials in many respects. Some of us desired to give to that splendid class of postal officials, the railway mail clerks, an additional compensation. I myself felt that each clerk ought to have, in view of the great risk he runs and because his life is in peril almost every day, at least $100 more compensation by way of money, not by the way of per diem and payment for meals and lodging, but the committee, in its wisdom, had another view and has perfected a plan by which this class of brave men will finally, in a measure, be better compensated than they are now. It is a plan that may have danger ultimately lurking in it, the beginning, perhaps, of a system which, in my judgment, is an unwise one. I do not believe in invading the private affairs of a public official; I do not believe in paying for his lodging and his board. I do not believe in making him a ward of the Government; I do not believe in an allowance for per diem expenses in any line of business beyond the actual expense, and that ought to be covered not in the way of expense, but in the way of compensation for monthly or daily services performed. You in part take away the high spirit of independence and courage in your public servants when you follow them into the private affairs of life and administer to them food and lodging. Why not clothing, too?

Mr. LLOYD. Would the gentleman take away the per diem from the post-office inspectors?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The post-office inspector is not on regular duty. He is assigned for certain duty at certain times. I would pay the post-office inspector just what it costs him to live. I would not give him $4 a day and let him live upon $1, and turn the other $3 out of the Federal Treasury into his own pocket. I would make him an honest man by giving him an honest compensation for his services. If his special duties were such that it required a variance from the general rule of administration, I would give him the actual expense, but I think that there is nothing more detrimental to the public service than the policy that is pursued in that very line of business to-day. The hundreds of inspectors are traveling free upon the roads. They are going into all of the offices of the country and making inspections—and, by the way, I think about half of them are useless—and they are given $4 per day for expenses. Information that comes to me is that in most instances their per diem expense is about $1.50 to $2. They concede that they take the other $2 and use it for their own private purposes. Why not let the Government have the benefit of this situation and limit the expense daily to a reasonable amount and pay it, and not give this inducement to peculation on the part of its public servants? If they are not paid enough, raise their salaries and put an end to this improper practice.

Mr. Chairman, talking about the post-office bill is like talking about an encyclopedia or trying to define a dictionary. You get through with one subject, and by the time you do you have another one waiting for you. I can not attempt to go into a full discussion of all these questions, but I have suggested that certain evils exist in the departments; that certain methods obtain there by which maladministration is unavoidable in many features of that service. There are other methods there which are inviting—as we unfortunately know from the history of the past—to a career of corruption. Let me suggest some method of relief. I have already suggested in reference to the railway mail pay, the space or compartment pay, and the ownership of our post-office cars. But that department needs a reorganization; it needs the establishment of business methods somewhat along the line reported by the postal commission and as outlined to-day by a bill prepared by that commission, and of which I had the honor to be a member, and now introduced to the House by the chairman of the committee, being H. R. 21321. In that bill you will find outlined a system which will correct, in my humble judgment, many of the unbusinesslike methods of this department that will preserve it, in a measure, from an extravagance which almost of necessity has existed in many of its branches. The Postmaster-General should be continued as the political head of the department only and as a member of the President's Cabinet with general supervision of the department, but the business administration of that department ought to be taken away from politics. [Applause.]

I care not what party is in power, that is one office that ought not to be the seat of political power. There business methods should be diligently applied; there we ought to have a director of posts, with sufficient knowledge and information acquired by long service in the business world and in postal affairs to enable him to give a direction to the affairs of that great department, which will enable him to fully comprehend the postal affairs of the country and their relation to the affairs of the business world, and determine that which in good judgment, good common sense, and justice ought to be done.

Sir, I believe so firmly that a director-general ought to have charge, and not a political Postmaster-General, of the affairs of that office, that I would be willing to depart for a time from the time-honored principle of the Democratic party and see a man placed in power there for a long term of years, without the possibility of rotation in office with anyone and without the right of removal, except for corruption or maladministration. With him I would have a half dozen assistant directors or bureaus, each with all the corelated subjects of jurisdiction belonging to that branch coming under one head for the purpose of speedy and correct administration.

Let us have the departmental affairs under the control of the director-general of posts, with a bureau of transportation, bureau of mail matter, bureau of appointments, bureau of finance, bureau of accounts and supplies, the purchasing agent of post-offices, the commission to determine all questions that may arise between the people and the department upon principles of law and equity, to avoid the ruins of arbitrary administration. We, of course, of necessity must have the various officers necessary to carry on the affairs of the Government under these bureaus, both in the departmental and the postal service. The various heads of the bureaus, under the director of the posts, should meet with him at least once a week and consult over the affairs and matters relating to these departments. Each subdirector should submit to the director-general a report of the service to determine and remedy any defects in the administration that could be reached by postal regulations.

Let them have their purchasing agent before them. Let them bring before them any administrative officer and inquire into the affairs. We should have a balance showing the affairs of that department at least once a month. Expert accountants tell us that is impossible now to obtain at any time. The bill of the Postal Commission suggested a division of the country into 15 great sections, in each of which there was to be an inspector, a chief clerk, and a stenographer. That territory would be controlled, so far as postal affairs are concerned, by those officials. They would submit to the director-general a report of the service in their districts monthly.

The advantages of such a system would be apparent. The proximity of the officers in charge of a section with the work of that section would be such as to secure better information and better means of information. The cost would be lessened. You can accomplish results more satisfactorily in a confined field than a broad open field, over which you have control from a central point and from which you have no control over intermediate points necessary to the proper discharge of the duties involved in that field of endeavor. It would save this Government an immense amount of money in the transportation of supplies. Why should you transport at great expense from the Commonwealth of Connecticut to California postal supplies when, if your country was divided into the districts shown for the purpose of administration, those supplies might be purchased in San Francisco or the State of California or some adjoining State, and the long haul across the continent saved to the Government?

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman aware that the practice at present is, in most of the States, to have a depository where supplies are kept and the offices in the State are supplied from that depository?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, I understand that; and I understand, too, they are hauling a great deal of them from one point of the country to another. And I understand another fact, and it is to the credit of the administration that it is so, that along those lines of economy many of the suggestions which are contained in this bill now have been adopted by regulation. Again, Mr. Chairman, another feature of this bill is a provision for accounting. It is an adoption of a method of checks and balances by which ultimate settlement of the accounts of the various bureaus of the Department of the Post-Office may be facilitated to the auditor's office for that department in the Treasury Department. It provides for a system by which fraud in the issuing of money orders and various other issues connected with the Third Assistant's office may be possibly avoided by the use of those checks in accounting. Again, it provides for the abolition, by the creation of an impressed system of post-offices, of more than 24,000 fourth-class offices in the Uniter States and the accounting that now takes a vast sum of money to keep us informed and the department informed of the workings of those offices.

But I must pass from this question. We might talk for a day on the question of the administrative features proposed in this measure which we have offered for the consideration of the Congress at a subsequent day, but closely related and heretofore contained as a provision in this bill is another measure upon which I desire to speak but briefly, because it is connected with the postal service. There is pending before the House a bill which bears this title:

A bill to promote the American merchant marine in foreign trade and the national defense, and for other purposes.

This bill is reported from another committee. It comes from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It is the same measure that heretofore came from the Post-Office Committee and met defeat in the House of Representatives. The title of this bill, to say the least, is anomalous. How is it possible for any honest array of facts or any statement that is sought to be enacted as a mandate of this Congress into law to be contained in the conglomerate, perverted statement of the purposes of a bill like that one before me? Do not you know what this measure means? Are you deceived? Do you think that a few unimportant sections like those that are recited in this bill can rehabilitate and reestablish the American merchant marine and the supremacy of this Republic over the high seas? Do you believe that there is a single suggestion in this measure responsive to the title "for the national defense?" What effective feature does it contain for national defense? Why the lobby in the corridors of the Capitol and hired agents, the tools of fraud and trusts, discussing ship subsidies over the country, misrepresenting the facts, falsifying the records, attempting to obtain from the people a commendation of a measure reeking with political corruption and shameless in its dishonor? There is plunder for hired agents in the measure.

There are no people on this earth so susceptible, if I may use the term, to the very instincts of commerce as the American people. There are no people upon this earth to whom so successful an appeal can be made as when you appeal to their patriotism in the alleged interests of their country in any way.

Ah, time and time again, Mr. Speaker, have the plunderers of the Federal Treasury directed the eyes of the people to the stars on the flag of the Republic while they reached down and plundered the National Treasury. [Applause.] This is but a repetition of that oft, that long-practiced method of deception.

And what is this proposition? Why should it be here? Has, indeed, the American merchant marine fallen into ultimate decay? Are no longer our merchantmen dipping their sails in foreign ports? Are the ships that so proudly bore our commerce tied to the shore and in decay forever? If so, tell us why and who is responsible. Was it ever so, or is it now only so? If this condition exists, there is a reason for its existence. If it can be remedied, those evils that brought the hour of decadence must be removed. What are they? Whence did they come, and who is responsible? Perhaps the grave events that have passed in the last half century were such that benefit came to the American people greater than could have obtained possibly if a merchant marine had still flourished. I am not here to concede that, but no doubt the gentlemen who believe in the policies, the economic polity of this Government for the last half century, will find the only legitimate and logical excuse for the decay of the merchant marine in that declaration. Did the American merchant marine ever occupy the seas? Was your flag, protecting commerce, ever seen in all the civilized ports of the world?

There was a day when this was true. What was the period of our history in which it was true? It was before the days of combinations and of trusts in trade. It was before the day when the ports of your country by your tariff laws were closed to the commerce of all the world beside. It was in that day of Democratic supremacy, when the tariff was raised for the purpose, not of protecting monopolies in trade, but for the purpose of obtaining revenue to administer the government of the people economically and justly. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In those days there was a merchant marine. In those days the Republic was the mistress of the commerce of the seas. Why the end of that period? I am not here to charge all the evils that may have befallen our country upon the opposite party. Here is a fact with which we must deal in determining the propriety of the amendment now proposed to the oceanic subsidy act. We must know, as we do, that our merchant marine once flourished; that our commerce was once great, and that it is no more. You ask me why tariff should have that effect. You may send your ships laden to the four quarters of the earth with the products of the Republic, but they must, perforce, of necessity, by virtue of your very law, return without a cargo. Why bring a cargo from the ports of the earth, from other lands and from other seas, when the tariff tax upon it is so heavy at our ports as to prevent its entry and the possible disposition of it? Does not that have some effect, gentlemen? Can commerce flourish when ships must return empty? Has not that fact in the history of your country sufficient in it to appeal to your judgment for a change in the great economic policy of the Republican party that stands, not for equality, not for the equal rights of the citizen, but for the special-privileged class that finds protection under the tariff laws of your country? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, let us start out with the suggestion, with the demonstrated fact, that a high protective tariff and a successful and flourishing merchant marine can not live contemporaneously. If you would have the high protective tariff, if you would close your ports to the commerce of the world, you must abandon the idea of a merchant marine. If you would have a merchant marine, you must withdraw the subsidy of protection from the manufacturing interests and give equality of taxation to the common people, that your Government may be administered with purity and integrity and all of its great functions performed on land and sea. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You then, by your legislation upon this question, have made in part a merchant marine impossible. Ah, what more have you done by your registry and navigation laws? You have shut off the competition of the world and given to shipowners and shipbuilders the benefit of laws creating monopoly, in the vain hope that they may rehabilitate the lost trade, a trade destroyed by a domestic economic proposition which you call the protective tariff, which we know is a destructive tariff, a blight to commerce, a crime against consumers, a protection only to monopoly. How will you do it? You can not do it. You will never reach the realm of supremacy to which you aspire without the expenditure of many more millions of money in the subsidies than even proposed in this bill, without a change in your policies.

But look at the facts for a minute. We already have a ship-subsidy law. We already have a law by which ships of the first class making a voyage of 4,000 miles to certain portions of the earth are paid a subsidy of $4 a mile. You have another section in the statute which gives to second-class ships $2 per mile, to third-class ships $1 per mile, to fourth-class ships two-thirds of the compensation of the third-class vessels. What is the result? They carry your mails. Your foreign mail pays you, as Members all know—the exact figures are not before me—but in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 of profit annually. Have you enough facilities to carry your mail that you are subsidizing? No one doubts it. You claim that your subsidies are not as great as the subsidies of other countries. The performance of duty on the part of your subsidized lines is not as great. The business does not exist for them in the transportation of mails from those remote places on the Pacific that exists with foreign countries, and the comparison of the figures of subsidized lines in other countries is totally irrational and illegitimate.

But, back to the question of compensation. What are they getting? Suppose they perform a voyage of 4,000 miles; suppose they carry a single letter. There is in that case a compensation of $16,000 for one trip under the subsidy law as it now stands. Is there any complaint that our mails are not carried? Is there any evidence before you that by doubling the provisions for the subsidy, as proposed in this bill as an amendment of the act of March 3, 1891, we will accomplish any more results? Where is the benefit to the postal service upon which the bill rests? Under a subsidy we pay to the owners of American vessels about three times as much as we pay to foreign vessels for the same service and yet the merchant marine is not improved and foreign vessels clear large profits.

The lines are already in commission, all that are needed for this purpose. Does anybody tell us that the law requires new ships or new lines? If we grant this additional subsidy, it means that second-class ships may be used in the place of first-class ships under the very terms of the act, receiving the compensation of first-class vessels. It is doubling the compensation for second-grade work. Where is the benefit to arise to this people from that condition? You propose by this bill to let shipbuilders of vessels that are now in commission carrying the mail to sequestrate by operation of law 80 per cent of your foreign-mail revenues. Why do not they come and ask the sequestration of the revenue in some branch of the service that is doubtful in the amount that it would yield? They clasp upon the ocean revenue, where the profit exists. They ask you to do this in the interest of our merchant marine, in the face of economic provisions which prevent a flourishing marine, in the face of the fact that more than double compensation is now received by them. They ask you to give away all the profits on the ocean-bearing mail to the owners of the ships, and what do they promise you in return? That they will carry one American boy on the deck of each ship to be trained in the art of seamanship and of war.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. I desire to correct the gentleman. The compensation for this naval cadet is to be paid out of the increased tonnage tax that is developed under the present bill, and not under this subsidy at all.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am glad the gentleman has made this suggestion. They make us pay for training a boy and give them subsidy, too. Where is the benefit to your navy? What good will these second-class hulls, plying on the waters of the Pacific and the far-off isles of the sea, do for our navy? What service will they render to you in the way of help if any foreign war should be declared? What of benefit would there be? How would they stand before the Dreadnoughts of Great Britain? What good would they be even for coaling transports or convoys?

Mr. Chairman, under the proposition for a ten-years' contract, the Treasury of the United States will give and lose to these ship lines more than $4,000,000 of money per year. This enormous sum of $40,000,000 could be available for the purpose of building ships and convoys for war vessels if the conditions were such that we would need them. Do not be disturbed. It is the feeblest blind that was ever offered to an intelligent Congress. [Applause.] With your great navy, with the building year by year of more battle ships, with the declaration to all mankind that we are for peace, but will prepare for war if it must come, would you rely on the rotten hull of a mail-bearing vessel as even a temporary aid to your navy and your national defense?

A single boy, indeed, to be trained in the art of navigation, in the duties of a sailor, by these menials who man the ships bearing the post cards and letters of the people to distant islands! The national defense, indeed! What a step toward a great national defense!

Gentlemen, the proposition in this bill that these old vessels shall not be sold without the consent of Congress, that no great railroad corporation shall have any connection with the subsidized line which the people are going to give to the men now interested in ship subsidies, but not in railroad subsidies, is, indeed, a tender suggestion of patriotic prejudices. Why, do you think that because of the great combinations of railways in the United States, and the great questions of transportation and rates that are paramount in the public mind, the statement in a bill like this that there shall be no combination with the railroads, should appeal to you? Have you no more sense than to swallow a bait like that? Ah, sir, there is no honest man who can read that bill and find within it anywhere a single item that will appeal to the patriotism of any man in this House. It is the blind of the corruptionist that is held up before you; I trust, to your astonished vision.

But this brings me to a sadder reflection. I do not believe, I never did believe, that these people in this great country with whom I differ upon economic questions are less honest, less sincere, and less patriotic than I claim to by myself, or than I claim the Democratic party, of which I am a member, is. If I thought that any great portion of this people were actuated by the spirit of corruption, I would fear not so much for my country or its institutions, because the spirit of plunder can not ultimately prevail over national honor.

But when honest people fall in line behind the corruptionists, not believing in a scheme of corruption, but following the policies which their party proclaim as best for the public interest, pressing a remedy more dangerous than the conditions to be relieved, danger is ever portended. It is along the lines of unsound political education and thought resulting in unsafe policies that danger exists. Fixing my faith upon the principles of the Constitution of my country, believing in the doctrine of morality and truth, I stand here to-day to proclaim that from my standpoint I could not be an honest man and divert one single dollar from the Treasury of my country into the coffers of the ship subsidists or the railroad plunderers. [Applause.] And yet there are men who are as honest as I am, who are more intelligent, who, following the principles of government in which they believe, necessarily pursue policies predicated upon those principles of government, and reach the conclusion, in truth and honesty, that a course with which I disagree is best for me and for them and for our common country. It is to them that we must appeal. It is to that reason, that intellect, that superb patriotism that must at last guide us all to which we must appeal. Shall we take them back to the Constitution? Shall we say "Your policies are not in accordance with it?" They meet us upon the field of debate. They are trained differently, they think differently, they are honest in their faith. Their environment has been one, ours has been another. But to us all, as one, must come the solution of the great questions that affect the welfare of our country. No subsidy—to a Democrat—can be honest. And yet upon the doctrine of the Republican party, with its views as to the exercise of the taxing power, with the implication of power upon power which they assume, in the construction of the Constitution, it appears to them to be right.

We talk about our country, its Government, and its Constitution. I believe that men of all parties in every period of this country's history have loved the Republic and cherished the Constitution as they understood it. But the great differences have arisen in construction. Did you ever think, as we proclaim the glories of the Democracy and the splendors of the Republican policies, that this great Government of ours, the freest Republic in the world, rests upon a Constitution that is only half Republican or half Democratic—a Constitution in which lie buried, germinating perhaps to-day, the seeds of monarchy itself? Your great Constitution was the result of a compromise between an advanced Democracy and the advocates of imperial power. You had no constitution upon which a republic could survive for a century until the immortal Jefferson and his compeers charged their souls with God-like spirit to heave a tottering nation once again up to glory, and had passed the first ten amendments to the Federal Constitution. In these are the renewed faith, the hope of human government and human happiness. There you find the declarations that make the real Constitution and determine the purposes of this Government; there you learn the lesson that the Federal Government while supreme within the sphere of its jurisdiction is but a half sovereign; there you learn that the state government while supreme within the sphere of its constitutional powers is but a half sovereign; there you learn, too, of the inalienable rights of the people not delegated to any government. This trinity of rights—federal, state, and individual—is the consummation of a system at once the most unique, free, and powerful in the history of human governments. The exercise separately but in unison of these powers makes a complete sovereignty.

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

This is the language of the Constitution. This is, then, a Republic of limited powers. Differences in the construction of the powers of governments have produced for us parties of diverse principles and policies. These amendments and others linked to the Constitution unite it in purpose and spirit with the Declaration of Independence. In these you find the faith of Democracy.

Do you ask me what a Democrat is? I will tell you that he is one who believes, first and foremost, in the love of humanity; he believes in those principles of government upon which policies can be evolved and used to carry forth to the world those endeavors that are best for mankind. He believes in the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." He believes in economy of administration in state and federal affairs, and, clinging ever to the central doctrine of the Republic, he believes that his country can survive alone by obedience to its Constitution. He forever opposes the doctrine that if the reserved rights of States and citizenship be not exercised that the Federal Government has any right to exercise those powers. [Applause.]

Without jealousy of federal power, he would carry federal authority to the limits of its exercise in obedience to the Constitution, and leave forever untouched by federal jurisdiction the supreme rights of States and the inalienable rights of the citizen.

I would not detract from the splendid achievements of the Republican party nor the sincerity of purpose of that great political organization. The history of this party is the history of nearly half a century of America by Americans one and all.

But when we consider the policies of this party, its practices and tendencies, its unjust system of taxation, its partiality to the classes, its usurpation of power in legislative, judicial, and executive departments, its utter extravagance and waste of the people's money, its thorough contempt for and disregard of constitutional limitations as evidenced by a part of its record, we must appreciate the more the necessity of teaching to the rising generation the cardinal doctrine of a constitutional democracy.

Mr. Chairman, we do not appreciate how we pass away from the doctrines that alone can make us a great people, nor the significance of our example and its influence on the world and the world's history. The spirit of our Constitution is pervading the earth.

From the hour of the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence democratic thought has seriously challenged the attention of nations and the progress of republican government has steadily advanced. Our example has encouraged and enlightened mankind, and while it may not be the controlling reason for the modification of conditions in autocratic government, it has made beneficent conditions possible there.

We have seen in our day the popular electorate established in hitherto practically absolute governments, and church and state separated that both might be free. France has reared the standard of a republic. Germany has consolidated feeble principalities in a great federal institution with constitutional guaranties. Slavery has practically disappeared from the earth. The shield of Russia's autocracy has been pierced and the voice of the people heard at the foot of her throne.

The unspeakable Turk, halting in a career of crime, hears the proclamation of a constitution as he becomes a prisoner of state in his palace. Armenia shall yet worship as Americans do, according to the dictates of their own consciences. The blood of her people has not been shed for religious liberty in vain. The crescent banner of Mohammed shall yet protect the votaries of the cross of Calvary. But yesterday Great Britain spoke at the ballot box; to-day Ireland holds the balance of power in that mighty Empire. Her struggle for liberty is nearing an end. With tears of love and pity we encouraged her in her sorrows. We shall greet her soon with shouts of joy, when home rule is established and Freedom waves her banner once more over every foot of the soil of the Emerald Isle. Mr. Chairman, one-third, perhaps, of mankind believes in the doctrine of the Nazarene. Many look upon Him as a seer and prophet, in whose existence, as an elder brother, there may at last be union and oneness with God. The vast number of the earth believe in the immutable laws of nature and that nature is God and that God is love. Strike down the faith of a people, if you will, and the world will move back to the darkness of medieval ages.

Let the minister in the Christian pulpit cease persistently to declare the simple text of "Christ and Him crucified," and the Christian religion in one century would fade from the earth, and that magnificent civilization that followed it would perish before mankind.

So, too, in the affairs of a nation. This Republic was builded on the foundation of equality. It was built and maintained that truth and justice and liberty might not perish. It knows no law above the sublime individuality and power of its citizenship regulated and controlled by its Constitution. It knows no sovereignty save that of the common citizen. Yet, if to-morrow in the administration of national affairs, we shall destroy national guaranty and equality of rights under the law, then that rock upon which the Republic was founded will crumble and we shall see the fabric of the Union totter and fall, and amid its ruins behold the annihilation of the States, as each star upon that flag representing their sovereignty fades away before the coming light, the glare and the glitter of imperial power. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to use more of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] one hour, or such time as he desires.

Mr. LLOYD. Before I proceed, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter here which I should like to have read and inserted in the RECORD. It is a letter written to me by a constituent and bears on the bill before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read in the time of the gentleman. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLINTON, IND., February 14, 1910.

Hon. R. MOSS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a miner, and as a natural sequence, very poor. Among the luxuries that I and my family enjoy and which have become necessities to us are four or five magazines and a weekly paper or two. These, like meat, we do not wish to boycott. In the last year or two we have been compelled to pay 50 per cent more for them—a tribute, it is said, to the paper trust. Some of our wise statesmen have recently discovered that newspapers, periodicals, etc., are the recipients of a substantial subsidy at the hands of the Government. They, unfortunately, have not been able to see the cranium of the colored gentleman in the national wood pile in its relation to railroad and express companies. Possibly it may be well to remind these gentlemen that history tells us that in some instances boycotts have been followed by revolutions. The American people have been very, very patient while being plundered by special interests. There comes a time when patience ceases to be a virtue. We are getting mighty close to it. When millions of laboring men are talking of, and in some cases—as in this city—boycotting the physical necessities of life, is it wise to compel a mental boycott? It can lead to only one thing, a change in our rulers or a revolution.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours,

T. J. LLEWELLYN.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department is the people's branch of the Government and is maintained almost wholly by special stamp taxes. It is a rapidly growing service. In 1800 its receipts were $280,804 and its expenditures $213,994, while in 1900, after a century of usefulness, there receipts were $102,354,000 and its expenditures $107,700,000. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, the receipts were $204,000,000 and the expenditures $221,000,000. This service reaches the home of every individual, whether rich or poor, urban or rural. There has been very much discussion recently about the discrepancy between the receipts and expenditures, and there seems to be a well-defined sentiment in favor of making the receipts equal the expenditures. For myself, I do not understand why it is necessary that the expense of this department of the Government should be wholly met by special taxation. If there is a deficiency in the proper administration of the department and in carrying to the people the service that is best for them and the General Government, I do not know why there should be any objection to making a part payment for that service out of the General Treasury. In either event its expenses must be met by taxation. If it does not come in one form, it does in another.

This bill carries an immense appropriation. A greater amount is provided in it than in any bill in the history of this Government—$239,000,000. It is necessarily larger than last year, and will continue to grow with the expanding postal service. Very much that this bill carries simply complies with the provisions of the existing law. The salaries of the postmasters, clerks in post-offices, letter carriers, railway mail clerks, rural letter carriers, and many other employees are fixed by statute. The amount designated for the transportation of the mails depends upon the law in such cases, and the appropriation is only intended to meet the requirements of the existing service. The railway mail pay of star routes, steamboat service, electric and cable lines, and pneumatic-tube service are all fixed either by statute or contract, and it is the duty of the Post-Office Committee to provide the amount necessary to meet all these expenditures. You will readily observe, after taking out of this appropriation the items to which I have referred, that but little remains about which the Post-Office Committee has discretion. In other words, under present conditions it is not possible to make this bill much less in amount than that which it now carries.

I take pleasure in commending the statement that was made by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], with reference to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. No man with whom I have been associated has apparently endeavored more sincerely to fully discharge the duty that he owes to this House and to the country than he has in the preparation of this bill. I take pleasure in making this statement about an individual who happens to be my political adversary, and I am gratified that I may say that in the consideration of this great supply bill politics has received no consideration. There are numerous features in the bill about which the members of the committee have differed, but seldom, if ever, have they divided on political lines. I would not confine my commendation of the committee, however, to the chairman alone. I am pleased to say that the Post-Office Committee devotes itself to its work and presents nothing to this House without careful consideration.

Recently we have heard much about second-class mail matter. The newspapers, magazines, and periodicals have been greatly exercised about the statements made by the Postmaster-General in his report and recommendations made by the President in his annual message to Congress. Some people who have not given this careful consideration feel that these periodicals have been rather too much concerned about what is likely to occur, but my judgment is that they have acted very wisely in undertaking to change what might otherwise have been the trend of public sentiment in favor of an increase of postal rates on second-class matter.

In order that I may be entirely fair to the President, I quote from his message the following language:

> The deficit every year in the Post-Office Department is largely caused by the low rate of postage of 1 cent a pound charged on second-class mail matter, which includes not only newspapers, but magazines and miscellaneous periodicals. The actual loss growing out of the transmission of this second-class mail matter at 1 cent a pound amounts to about $63,000,000 a year. The average cost of the transportation of this matter is more than 9 cents a pound. It appears that the average distance over which newspapers are delivered to their customers is 291 miles, while the average haul of magazines is 1,049, and of miscellaneous periodicals, 1,128 miles. Thus, the average haul of the magazine is three and one-half times and that of the miscellaneous periodical nearly four times the haul of the daily newspaper, yet all of them pay the same postage rate of 1 cent a pound. The statistics of 1907 show that second-class mail matter constituted 63.91 per cent of the weight of all the mail and yielded only 5.19 per cent of the revenue.
> The figures given are startling, and show the payment by the Government of an enormous subsidy to the newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, and Congress may well consider whether radical steps should not be taken to reduce the deficit in the Post-Office Department caused by this discrepancy between the actual cost of transportation and the compensation exacted therefor.
> A great saving might be made, amounting to much more than half of the loss, by imposing upon magazines and periodicals a higher rate of postage. They are much heavier than newspapers, and contain a much higher proportion of advertising to reading matter, and the average distance of their transportation is three and a half times as great.

I suppose that no one would believe that the President himself has had the opportunity to carefully investigate the delicate questions involved in the determination of proper rates for the carriage of the mail and the relative burden of the several kinds of mail matter. His statement was evidently based almost wholly upon the report of the Postmaster-General, and in order to corroborate fully this statement, I submit herewith quotations from the latest report of the Postmaster-General:

> Until recently the department did not possess the necessary data on which to base reliable estimates of the cost of the various services performed in return for these charges. The special weighing of the mails in 1907 furnished the first statistics that were sufficiently comprehensive for this purpose. A few weeks ago a careful computation based on these statistics and on the revenues and expenditures of the postal establishment for the fiscal year 1908 was brought to completion, showing the profit or loss chargeable in that year to the handling of the several classes of mail and to the conduct of the registry, special delivery, and money-order services. In arriving at the cost of each item not only the amount expended solely on its account was included, but also a fair proportion of the expenditures indirectly chargeable in part to the item. The results obtained were as follows:

Item.	Receipts.	Expenses.	Profit.	Loss.
First-class mail	$132,304,844.51	$78,630,649.89	$53,674,194.62
Second-class mail	9,066,043.61	73,194,070.52		$64,128,026.91
Third-class mail	25,556,111.37	28,785,633.49		3,229,522.12
Fourth-class mail	7,755,921.70	5,659,732.19	2,096,189.51
Foreign mail	8,585,564.24	6,080,553.53	2,505,010.71
Free congressional mail		518,385.45		518,385.45
Free departmental mail		5,219,661.65		5,219,661.65
Registry service	2,889,912.80	6,768,437.41		3,878,524.61
Special delivery service	1,373,451.40	1,233,164.35	140,287.05
Money-order service	8,946,813.78	4,015,206.52		68,392.74

> The most striking fact disclosed by the statistics here is the tremendous loss on account of second-class mail. While this class of mail provides a revenue of little more than 1 cent a pound, the cost to the Government for its handling and transportation averages 9.23 cents a pound. The annual loss thus incurred, as already stated, is more than $64,000,000.

The Postmaster-General further discussed the subject of second-class mail matter by calling attention to the per cent of weight of various kinds of second-class mail and the average distance such mail is carried in the following words:

> From the special weighings of 1906 and 1907 estimates have been made of the per cent of weight and the average hauls of each of the several subclasses named in the statute of 1906, subscribers' copies and sample copies combined, with the following results:

Class of periodical.	Per cent of weight.	Average haul.
		Miles.
Daily newspapers	40.50	291.27
Weekly and other than daily newspapers	15.23	558.20
Scientific periodicals	1.30	903.84
Educational periodicals	.64	733.75
Religious periodicals	5.91	682.50
Trade-journal periodicals	4.94	805.32
Agricultural periodicals	5.00	598.48
Magazines	20.23	1,048.67
Miscellaneous periodicals	6.25	1,128.10

> It will be noticed that the average haul of the magazine is more than three and one-half times, and of the miscellaneous periodical nearly four times, the haul of the daily newspaper, yet all of them pay the same postage rate of 1 cent per pound.

In another place in his report he makes this statement:

> Magazines proper, because of their long average haul, show a cost of more than 5 cents a pound for transportation, while in the case of daily newspapers, for which the average haul is much less, the transportation cost is less than 2 cents a pound.

The Postmaster-General, in discussing the different suggestions with reference to the method of increasing the rate, where it should be adopted, and what should be the plan by which the present deficiency should be overcome, concludes with this general statement:

> No matter which of these plans shall be adopted, or whether the simpler method now in force of charging a flat rate on all second-class mail shall be continued, some substantial advance in the postage rate on such mail should be made in order to reduce the tremendous losses the government revenues are now suffering from this source. The educational and other benefits that come from the spreading of information through the medium of periodical publications are generally recognized, but the fact that the postal service is now handling these publications at a public expense so many times greater than the revenue yielded is worthy of most earnest attention.

It seems to me perfectly evident that the President and the Postmaster-General had the purpose of overcoming a deficit of $17,000,000 by increasing the rate on second-class mail matter. Why call special attention to it? Why figure so closely as to how much is lost by reason of carrying second-class mail matter? Why lay special stress upon it, if it was not intended that there should be a change in these rates? I am inclined to the belief that the Post-Office Department has not fairly represented the case of second-class mail matter to the country. Neither do I believe that periodicals and magazines, through their representatives before the Post-Office Committee, are borne out by the facts in the contention they make, that the Government loses nothing in carrying second-class mail at 1 cent per pound. I fully concur with the statement made by my colleague [Mr. MOON] on this point. There is a loss on second-class matter. I do not think anyone need question that. Just how much that loss is no man can tell. It is a remarkable thing, as was explained by the gentleman from Tennessee, that nearly every feature of post-office methods is so changed from the ordinary manner of conducting business that it is impossible to determine the exact cost of any class of mail. I do not believe there is an individual in the United States who can tell you to-day what it costs to carry the second-class mail.

The Postmaster-General has made a computation of the expense for different purposes on account of the several classes of mail and the registry, money-order, and special-delivery services, as follows:

Item.	Total weight of mail, based on special weighing of 1907.	Transportation.	Railway post-office car service.	Railway Mail Service.	Rural Delivery Service. It might be of interest also to know in this connection the estimate of the Post-Office Department with reference to the revenue expense and profit or loss per pound and per piece for the several classes of mail. I submit herewith a table which is found in his report:

Class of mail.	Revenue per pound.	Expense per pound.	Profit per pound.	Loss per pound.

My own conviction, from the best information I can gather, is that it costs about 3 cents per pound to carry second-class mail. I concur in the conclusion reached by the chairman of this committee in his opening statement in that regard. A better statement, charging to second-class mail the expense to the Government for its transportation, handling, and delivery, would be:

Transportation	$13,511,205.79
Railway post-office car service	1,705,444.08
Railway Mail Service	3,231,072.11
Compensation of postmasters, clerks, carriers, etc	9,516,411.55
Other expenses chargeable	1,408,836.39
	29,372,969.92
Deduct from this the receipts from second-class mail at the 1 cent per pound rate	9,066,043.61
Leaves a total loss of	20,306,926.31

Which is very nearly 3 cents per pound.

It must be borne in mind that the purpose of the Post-Office Department as originally designed was to carry letter mail. Other classes of mail have been added, but, after all, the primary purpose of the establishing of the mail system was for the purpose of carrying first-class matter.

There has been very much complaint of second-class matter. If it were left out of account and no second-class mail were handled and it were possible to ascertain just what that cost would be, we could then easily determine the real cost of carrying second-class mail matter. A casual investigation will show that it would cost just as much to carry on the rural service without second-class mail as with it. So that in determining the abuses that arise from second-class matter it would be proper to wholly eliminate any charge upon second-class matter for its carriage through the rural service.

As to the railway transportation, it seems to me that the best method of determining what it costs the Government to transport second-class matter would be to take the transportation expense at a time when the total amount of mail carried was equal to the present weight of first, third, and fourth class mail. If this is done, you will readily ascertain that the computation I have made is very nearly correct as to transportation. The postmasters' salaries and other expenses incident to the work in the post-office is determined wholly, or in part, by the receipts of the Government for its carriage. The reports show that not quite one-twentieth of the receipts of the Postal Department come from second-class mail. In my computation for this branch of service I have more than doubled such a per cent. I do not see how more than I have charged should be justly placed against second-class matter.

Mr. FASSETT. But has not second-class mail largely overtaken in ratio the proportion of the other classes?

Mr. LLOYD. No; I think that statement has gone out, but I am very sure it is a mistake.

If you will take the weighings of 1899, you will find that the second-class mail carried was 427,168,055 pounds, while the total weight of mail was 635,180,362 pounds; or, second-class mail was about 67 per cent of the whole weight.

According to the estimates made from the special weighing of 1907, we find 792,580,967 pound of second-class matter, while the total weight of mail was 1,290,358,284 pounds; or, the second-class matter was about 61 per cent of the mail. It will be observed from this that there was a considerably greater per cent in 1899 than in 1907. It is true, it may be, that in the last three or four years there has been a special effort to get rid of the advertising sheet in second-class mail matter, and that has to some extent made a comparative reduction in the weight of second-class matter; but this reduction is very slight.

Mr. GAINES. In your computation of the cost of handling second-class mail you say that it would cost as much for the rural service if there was no second-class mail carried. Would this not apply to other classes as well?

Mr. LLOYD. There is something in that contention; but, remember, the primary object of carrying the mail is to transmit first-class matter.

Mr. GAINES. Carry the logic of it all through, and you could prove that none of it costs anything to carry it.

Mr. LLOYD. If it be true, as I have stated, that the Post-Office Department was established for the purpose of the transmission of letter mail and that afterwards the second, third, and fourth classes were added, it would not be fair, it seems to me, to make the same application to first-class matter as to either second, third, or fourth classes. There is at present no complaint on account of first-class matter, and none on account of third and fourth class rates, except that many persons think the rates are too high. But there is a constant complaint by the department about the loss on second-class mail. There seems to be no complaint in the country and no demand for a change, except from the officers of this department, who seem to have a prejudice against second-class mail. It is to me something of a mystery that nowhere do we hear of any serious complaint, except from the department itself. This department ought to represent the people, and I do not understand why it should continue to repeat, year after year, its reflection on the second-class mail rate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. With pleasure.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, will it interrupt the gentleman from Missouri if I call his attention to the fact that there was a loss last year on third-class mail of $3,229,522.12?

Mr. LLOYD. That is true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. With regard to second-class mail, does the gentleman believe that it would be practicable to have a different rate for the advertising matter, pure and simple, and the reading matter?

Mr. LLOYD. That is a matter for grave consideration, and on which I am not fully able to pass. The matter was repeatedly suggested in questions by my good friend from New York [Mr. FASSETT] in the investigations that were had from time to time before our committee. I am not sure whether that is practical or not. Now, there are those who believe we can separate the two and charge one rate for carrying the reading matter and another rate for carrying the advertising matter. If that could be done it would to a very great extent relieve the situation and overcome the deficit. But whether that is a practical proposition or not is a question. My own opinion is, however, that it is not practicable, because it is almost impossible to distinguish between advertising matter and that which is not, because so much of the advertising matter is reading matter and does not carry on its face the absolute stamp of the fact that it is advertising matter.

Mr. HARDY. Might it not be possible to provide a percentage that would be allowed for advertising matter in these literary magazines and publications of that kind?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir; I am inclined to think that is a matter worthy of consideration and might be effected. In other words, you might say that no magazine shall be admitted to the mails which carries more than 50 per cent of advertising matter.

Mr. GAINES. The same difficulty would intervene in determining what is advertising matter.

Mr. LLOYD. That is certainly true.

Mr. GAINES. It seems to me that it might be done by requiring the publishers to make affidavit of what was and what was not paid for.

Mr. LLOYD. The administration feature of this proposition, I think, can be more readily reached than the administration feature of the other proposition. One thing would be true. The enforcement of this provision would exclude from the mails magazines which bear a greater amount of advertising than that allowed by law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I was out and do not know whether the gentleman went into this question or not. Some of the magazines claim that the advertising features generate enough first-class mail matter to more than give compensation for the carriage of the second-class mail matter. Has anybody ever attempted to go into that, or would a man naturally go crazy if he did? [Great laughter.]

Mr. LLOYD. He would go crazy if he did. But the committee has undertaken to reach that question to some extent in the hearings before it.

It is not my purpose to further discuss second-class mail matter. It is, however, one of the greatest questions with which Congress has to deal. We need not weary ourselves about the deficit and the means by which it may be overcome, for if the Post-Office Department is placed on a modern business basis somewhat along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, it will become a paying institution without increasing the rates anywhere. [Applause.]

I do not believe it is necessary to increase second-class rates, and if it were necessary to overcome the deficit by changing them, I would think it unwise. It is the duty of the American Congress to encourage everything which tends to the upbuilding of citizenship of the country, and nothing accomplishes this more or better than for the people to be informed about conditions as they are.

The greatest civilizing agencies in America, in my judgment, are sent as second-class mail matter. The grandeur and greatness of this Republic, so dear to our hearts, is due more to that which is carried as second-class mail than to any other agency. If its prowess depended upon great navies and frowning fortresses, it would stand fifth in the race for preferment. If marshaled hosts and standing armies were the measure of its greatness, then it would sink into insignificance compared with the nations of the world. If ancestral blood and pampered aristocracy are to be the criterion which determine recognition, then Americans must stand aside and allow the royal pageants to pass. But if individual worth and respectability are determining factors, then our Government stands at the head of the column of achievement. This Government is what it is largely because of the public press and the crossroad school-house. To-day the county newspaper circulates free of postage in the county of its publication.

If you had the writing of the law, would you demand postage for this literature? This is the purest and cleanest of journalism. It is the channel through which the masses are directly reached in rural districts. It is the thermometer of public thought, the source of intelligence and information, the medium through which the home is reached and the knowledge of local affairs made known. It is a business with little of financial profit, engaged in by moral, patriotic, and exemplary men, free from graft and the demoralizing tendencies of the time.

Would you in any wise discourage the great daily newspapers by additional postage burdens? These papers may carry too many advertisements. Some go too far in scandal, vilification, and abuse, but these mighty engines of influence have the advantage of the mails at the second-class rate and pay only 1 cent a pound postage. Has the Government acted unwisely in fixing this law? Should this body discourage by any act the dissemination of such information? The laborer, as he wends his way to his place of business in the city, can, for a single cent, put himself in touch with the doings of the world. As he returns in the evening, for another penny he can take to his home the daily paper for his family to read.

The farmer now in most localities, when he sits with his family round the evening fire, can read the same daily paper and inform himself of the current events of the world. Would you place any barrier between the publisher and the reader of these great papers by adding additional postage, whether the postal rate is a source of revenue or a means of expense to the Government?

The magazines and periodicals, about which we have heard so much in condemnation because of their failure to bear their part of the postal burden, means much to the reading public. They give to them the deliberate and thoughtful judgment of great students on the issues affecting mankind. Who would take from the second-class mail the Youth's Companion, the Saturday Evening Post, and kindred publications? Why should the great magazines be deprived of the quickest transit at the present rate? In my judgment no expenditure brings greater returns than second-class mail matter. No investment means so much in its relation to the home and schoolhouse. None has added more to the sum of individual knowledge, and no step backward should be taken in this contribution to the intelligence and enlightenment of the people.

It is my purpose to call your attention to another matter about which most of you have received some correspondence. I have reference to the return-envelope proposition. You will notice that in this bill there is a provision that prevents, after the 30th of June, 1911, the printing by the Government of the name of the individial in the return card; the name of the individual, firm, or corporation, as the case may be. This proposition in the bill is what is known as the "Tou Velle bill," which was introduced in this Congress by the gentleman from Ohio. It is changed only in reference to the time when the law shall become effective. The Government now has a contract to furnish all the stamped envelopes that are used. This contract is awarded to a firm in Dayton, Ohio. These people print more than 1,459,510,000 stamped envelopes annually. The average price that is paid for such envelopes by the Government is something like 79 cents per thousand. Of course, in addition to that, 2 cents is paid by the consumer for postage on each envelope. The envelope then, without the stamp, costs the Government about 79 cents a thousand, and the retail price is about $1.24 per thousand. It is stated by the Postmaster-General in his report that under this contract the department made last year something like $731,789.60, or rather it had that amount left to pay the cost of distribution of stamped envelopes.

My belief is, from such examination of the matter as I have been able to make, that the Government not only did not make a profit of a single dollar, but on the other hand expended on account of this monopoly, given to the Dayton, Ohio, firm, as much, above all receipts, as is usually claimed as profit.

Mr. FASSETT. Are you charging it at 9 cents a pound?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I use the department figures in making the calculation.

Mr. FASSETT. Nine and three-fourths cents, to be accurate?

Mr. LLOYD. No; that same report which figures the cost of second-class matter at 9 cents figures the cost of merchandise or fourth-class matter at 12.3 cents. These 1,459,510,000 envelopes weigh about 100 to the pound. A thousand of them weigh about 10 pounds. You can readily estimate how many pounds of envelopes there would be. They weigh 14,595,100 pounds. If it costs the Government 12.3 cents to carry every pound of merchandise through the mail as the department estimates, then at that rate the postage expense on these envelopes would be $1,798,187.30.

Now, in order that you may understand me at this point, I want to call attention to this fact: These stamped envelopes are manufactured at Dayton, Ohio. The Government takes possession of these envelopes at Dayton, Ohio, and carries them through the mails to the various distributing points at its expense.

The Dayton, Ohio, firm has no carrying expense whatever. In addition to that, under existing regulations, the Post-Office Department advertises the stamped envelopes in every post-office. I have here a communication from the Postmaster-General on this subject, in which, at my request, he calls attention to what he sends through the mails. It may be interesting to you to know what the department does in the way of advertising these stamped envelopes.

A communication was sent on January 25, 1909, to each postmaster, which read as follows:

> The department is sending you herewith a supply of folders inviting attention to the advantages of stamped envelopes to the public and to the postal service. These are to be placed in the call and lock boxes of your office. Please give the distribution your immediate and careful attention. Additional copies will be supplied on request.
> A. L. LAWSHE,
> Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

The folders referred to in the letter consisted of three pages of typewritten matter, and explained the advantages of the stamped envelope, and especially directed attention to the fact that these stamped envelopes would be furnished in lots of 500 with the name and address printed in the upper left-hand corner without extra charge. It fully described the envelope, its quality, cost, and method of obtaining it.

There are 60,000 post-offices. Suppose there are 200 lock and call boxes in each office in the United States. There would be 12,000,000 of these circular letters in addition to the envelopes themselves.

A similar letter with a price list and order book was sent to each postmaster with these instructions:

> These are to be distributed by your city letter carriers to the principal business houses, professional men, fraternal organizations, public officers, and institutions likely to be interested in the use of stamped envelopes. The folders are to be left by the carriers at business houses and offices along their routes, without being addressed or inclosed in envelopes. Please give the distribution your immediate and careful attention.

There are over 30,000 letter carriers, and it is a reasonable supposition that these instructions would result in each letter carrier distributing as many as 100 of each of these several letters.

A third letter was sent to the postmasters bearing the same date, January 25, 1909, in which was found these instructions:

> These are to be distributed by your rural carriers to their patrons. The folders are to be left by the carriers in the boxes along their routes without being addressed or inclosed in envelopes. Please give the distribution your immediate and careful attention.

This letter was accompanied by a descriptive letter and an extended price list. There are over 40,000 rural letter carriers, and perhaps an average of 100 boxes to the route. This would give you an idea of the immense number of these several letters which were thus distributed by the order of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. In these notices that the gentleman has read I see reference to the printing on the corner of the envelope. Is not the Postmaster-General there dealing only with the question of stamped envelopes, whether they be printed or not?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. And your criticism of the carriage of envelopes through the mail, which I think is, in a measure, very just, applies as much to the stamped envelope which is not printed as it does to the one which has printing on the upper left-hand corner.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; it does.

Mr. SMITH of California. Therefore, the printing on the corner does not enter into the discussion?

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman is exactly right. Thus far I have made no distinction between the stamped envelope which has the name of the sender to whom it may be returned upon it and the one which does not. But I wish to call attention at the present time to what the Post-Office Department is doing.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Chairman, I have been informed that this company at Dayton secured this contract because they bid about $300,000 less than the so-called "paper trust," which formerly had this contract. Just for information, I should like to know if that is so?

Mr. LLOYD. They bid less. I do not know the exact figures.

Mr. CANTRILL. I have been informed that they bid $300,000 less.

Mr. LLOYD. There may be some member of the committee who can answer that. I can not.

Mr. FASSETT. If the gentleman does not object, I should like to ask him if he wants to leave the impression that it is his opinion that it actually does cost 12.3 cents a pound to send these envelopes through the mail?

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, no. I said I took the Government's figures. Certainly, however, the Post-Office Department can not complain.

Mr. FASSETT. Would you say that your own estimate of about 3 cents a pound would be nearer?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I would think so.

Mr. HARDY. As I understand it, the sending of these envelopes through the mail is a part of the penalty mail of the country, is it not?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not see how you can call this penalty mail.

Mr. HARDY. It is sent by the Government.

Mr. LLOYD. It goes as if it was penalty mail, but does not go under the penalty envelope. It has no envelope. The department that is especially complaining of the country that second-class privileges are abused is the department that is sending these circulars through the mail.

Mr. HARDY. That is what I wanted to have in the RECORD.

Mr. LLOYD. Think of how many people receive these folders. Here is a department directing the postmasters of the several towns and cities of the United States to deliver this advertising matter to the post-office boxes, to the city letter carriers, to the rural letter carriers. It is sent to the postmasters free of postage, and it is delivered through the post-office without postage charge. Who can compete with the Dayton (Ohio) firm? It has a complete monopoly. Here is where the newspapers and the stationers complain, and they have a right to complain.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think the gentleman is in error in saying that the newspapers complain of that part of it. They complain of the printing on the corner of the envelope, not in the sale of stamped envelopes. They have no interest in that.

Mr. LLOYD. There are two things of which the newspapers complain: One is the Government advertising these stamped envelopes, and the other is of the return name of the firm, corporation, or individual on the return envelope. The provision in this bill does not prevent the sending of stamped envelopes; as many stamped envelopes can be used after the bill passes as now. The law would not go into effect until the present contract with the Dayton, Ohio, people ceases; that is, after June 30, 1911.

Mr. SMITH of California. I understand the gentleman is inveighing against the practice of having stamped envelopes?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not taking that position. I have simply called attention thus far to what it costs the Government and what the Government is doing in the way of advertising and of distributing the stamped envelopes.

Mr. SMITH of California. I thought the gentleman's criticism ran to that effect.

Mr. LLOYD. It may run to that effect, but I have not made the statement, and it was not my purpose to do so. I intended to be understood that this bill had in no way interfered with the issuance of the stamped envelope nor with the existing contract with the Dayton, Ohio, firm. It may be readily seen that the Post-Office Department is sending these circulars through the mail, and that it is done so at great expense.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LLOYD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Do I understand from the gentleman's remarks that he is complaining that the Government is spending a large amount of money to give publicity to the fact, to business men and to people of the towns along the rural routes, that they will print for them the return envelope?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. And that the department does this at great expense?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman: Is it not the intention of these circulars that they send to business people through the rural routes to show that it is necessary to have the return cards printed on the envelopes?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; all the literature conveys the idea that the important thing is to have their names printed on the envelopes, and how they may be secured through the postmaster.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Not necessarily to buy stamped envelopes, but to buy envelopes that has the return card printed on them?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think that this point is worth making perfectly plain. As the gentleman read the notice, it did not mention any printing at all, and the Government does promote and encourage the purchase of stamped envelopes, regardless of the printing.

Mr. LLOYD. In order to be perfectly plain at that point, and to take no advantage of the department, I will be excused for reading from one of these letters:

> Government stamped envelopes will be furnished in lots of 500 with your name and address printed in the upper left-hand corner without extra charge.

The words "without extra charge" are emphasized, being printed in large capitals. Then there is this:

> This printing is termed the return card, and its value to users and to the Government is great.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do I understand that in all of these circulars which were sent to the postmasters and to the rural carriers reference was made to the printing?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then I did not understand the gentleman before.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know who furnishes the printed slips, the Dayton company or the Government?

Mr. LLOYD. During the present administration there has been nothing printed by the Post-Office Department in the way of advertisements. You will notice that these letters I have read were dated prior to the 4th of March, 1909, and as far as I know neither the present Postmaster-General nor any one of his assistants is responsible for the advertisements of this class of envelopes.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, I will state that the Government has heretofore furnished the envelopes with return card, but not with the name. The differentiating advantage in this case is that the name, as well as the return blank, is printed on the envelope.

Mr. MOSS. Will the gentleman permit me just to make a statement about what I know, of my own knowledge, of the custom of the rural carriers themselves?

Mr. LLOYD. If it is not too long.

Mr. MOSS. I should like to say that I live on the route of a rural carrier. He called my attention personally to the advantage of the matter, and wanted to take my order for some envelopes, so that the carrier himself called attention to it and solicited me to buy stamped envelopes from him. There is no question about that.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, on just a little different line, but rather difficult to differentiate, I present here the congressional franked envelope.

Mr. MACON. Yes; we have heard of those. [Laughter.]

Mr. LLOYD. I suppose everyone is aware of the fact that these can not be sent through the mail in bulk unless there is something in the envelope.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain? Does he mean that we can not take the ordinary congressional franked envelope, seal it, and send it without anything within the envelope?

Mr. LLOYD. I did not mean that exactly, because if it is sealed the supposition is that there is something in it. What I mean is this: That you can not get a box of these franked envelopes and send them to your homes without paying the mail charges or violating the law. That is not only true with reference to franked envelopes, but it is equally true with reference to the document slips and seed slips.

A number of Members of Congress in the past have sent their seed slips and packages of envelopes through the mail without knowing that it was a violation of the regulations of the department. The department that forbids their going through the mail sends these stamped envelopes and advertising matter without even being placed in a penalty envelope.

There are some figures that I now wish to submit that state in a more concise form the facts which I have related and the deductions which I have made.

The amount paid last year to the Dayton (Ohio) company by the Government was $1,264,677. If we add the cost of carrying the envelopes at the price shown by the Government to be the expense to it for carrying fourth-class matter, then there must be added $1,798,187. There was received by the Government from the sale of stamped envelopes $1,996,476, leaving as the amount of loss on account of stamped envelopes $1,065,288, a loss almost equal to the cost of the envelope. If each piece of literature distributed through the Post-Office Department in advertising the stamped envelope had been required to be placed in an envelope, it would have cost anyone sending them at least $238,000 for the stamps alone. According to the computations I have made, there were as many as 23,800,000 pieces of literature handled in distributing the advertisements—4,000,000 through rural carriers, 7,800,000 through city letter carriers, 12,000,000 through post-office boxes.

I do not think this is fair to the people, and I am certain it is not just to the stationers and printers of the country generally, who are engaged in manufacturing envelopes, printing, or selling them. [Applause.]

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. WEISSE. I hold in my hand a business envelope. The gentleman has been telling about the abuse of the franking privilege. Never before in the history of the country did we have any discrimination in the Post-Office Department until they began to publish or allow this matter to go out. Under this any large commercial house that will send 2,000 pieces—and nobody knows whether they send 10,000 pieces—can put them in the Post-Office Department and mail them without a stamp or anything except a printed permit, opening the Post-Office Department to fraud absolutely in mailing matter this way. And there is not any reason why these permits should be allowed to circulate in the mails because other commercial houses can buy printed wrappers with stamps, and if they misdirect a letter or wrapper, the Government will pay them back a cent and all they lose is the paper. All they lose here is the paper, and when they throw them in the post-office box, this permit matter, they can throw in 10,000 or 100,000 and nobody knows whether they have paid the right amount or not, except probably one or two. And never before, until these modern business people, who wanted to mail millions of these things, did this occur in the post-office, but they could not let a special privilege alone even in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will support the provision in the present bill repealing that.

Mr. WEISSE. Absolutely that or repealing any other privilege I will support when it comes here, and nobody will vote me as a party man either on it.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that any member of the Post-Office Committee would indorse this kind of action on the part of the Post-Office Department, and we are as anxious as the gentleman from Wisconsin that the practice shall not be followed.

A few words with reference to the railway-mail pay. It was not my purpose to discuss this subject, but I have received numerous letters, and I suppose most of you have, wanting to know "how I stand on the question." I have given the subject of railway-mail pay a great deal of attention. I do not mean that I have any expert knowledge, but I have such knowledge as I could pick up in my experience with the department and my service on the Post-Office Committee, and through such investigation as I could make. When I came to Congress I was impressed with the idea that the railway companies were receiving several times as much as they ought to receive for carrying the mails, but as I investigated the matter from time to time, the more I became doubtful as to what pay for railway mail ought to be. I believe in being frank in everything we are called upon to deal with, and I will tell you candidly today I do not know what these rates should be. I think my colleagues on the Post-Office Committee would say about the same thing. We do not know, because we have no way of determining. You can not compare railway rates with express rates [applause]; you can not compare them with freight rates. There is no system of comparison that can be made that will determine certainly what should be the amount that should be paid for carrying the mails. My own conviction is that too much is paid through trunk lines and too little is paid on short and independent lines, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. I believe with him that we ought to adopt some kind of a system so that all may know what is the proper compensation.

Mr. WEISSE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. WEISSE. Can the gentleman tell me how they get at the railway rate now as to what the railroads get for carrying the mails? What is the basis they use for computing the charges that the Government pays the railroads?

Mr. LLOYD. Well, I think so. It is on the weight of the mails.

Mr. WEISSE. When do they weigh the mail?

Mr. LLOYD. They weigh the mail in the springtime for a period of one hundred and five days. The United States is divided into four sections and they weigh in one section in each of the four years.

Mr. WEISSE. Do the postmasters undertake to go out and tell the customers in a town they are going to weigh the mail at such and such a time and ask them to put all the mail they can in in the next two weeks or the next month? I have had the postmaster several times come into the office and tell me to mail all matter we could; did not ask why, and it was long before I was a Member of Congress, and I did not know what he meant, but know now it meant more money to railroads and maybe to the postmaster.

Mr. LLOYD. That may be true of Sheboygan Falls, but I hardly believe it is true of the country at large.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he will produce the postmaster of his town before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and furnish that testimony.

Mr. WEISSE. It was B. H. Sanford, of Sheboygan Falls, who came into our office and made that request—that weighing was going on in his office and they wanted to make a good showing, and to mail all we possibly could.

Mr. LLOYD. He is not in office now, is he?

Mr. WEISSE. No; because he was a stalwart, and a half-breed has the job now, appointed by our senior Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. FASSETT. Was there any more mail actually sent than would have been sent otherwise?

Mr. WEISSE. I think probably some of them did; but I did not. Our office did not, but other offices did.

Mr. LLOYD. Now, with reference to the question of railway mail pay, of which I was trying to say something, it is one of the most difficult things to reach a correct conclusion after any kind of investigation. For instance, it is said that the express companies receive entirely too much for their service; and then, on the other hand, it is said that the express companies do not pay the railroads anything like as much as the railroads charge the Government for carrying the mails. And yet it is a fact that the railroads receive more for carrying express matter than they do for carrying the mail matter. They receive from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 more per year for carrying express matter than they do for carrying mail matter. Now, it is said, and I do not know that it is true, but it seems to be generally understood, that one-half of the receipts from an express office are paid to the railroad companies for carrying the express. Then, if that be true, there is received more than twice as much by the express companies for carrying the express matter of the country than there is by the railroads for carrying the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri such time as he desires.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I realize, of course, that it is very difficult to give accurate figures, as the gentleman has said. Could the gentleman tell us whether the rates in general are higher or lower in this country than they are in other countries?

Mr. LLOYD. No, I can not; and my judgment is that no one else can. The reason for that is this: We do not have the same elements in the computation. If we did, then we could determine whether they pay more or less in other countries than is paid here.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated that the railroad companies receive from five to seven million dollars more from express companies for carrying express packages than for carrying the mails. Is that a complete statement? Do I infer from that that they receive from five to seven million dollars more for carrying the same amount of express?

Mr. LLOYD. No. I do not know how much express they carry. The gentleman is aware of the fact that we have no report, except in a general way, on express matter. The statistics of the railways of the United States for 1907 show that the amount received by railroad companies for carrying the mails that year was $50,000,000 in round figures, and for carrying express, $57,000,000 in round figures. In 1906, the year preceding, $47,000,000 for carrying the mails and a little above $51,000,000 for carrying the express.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. There are no means available for determining the relative proportions of the two?

Mr. LLOYD. None at all, so far as I know.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield? Does that amount include the amount paid for the mail cars?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MACON. Includes all the cost paid to the railroads?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has no doubt that the total weight of express matter carried in this country is greater than the total weight of mails?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I imagine it is twice as much, but I am not sure about that, because I have no way of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are no figures?

Mr. LLOYD. Not so far as I know. I wish to say that I have only suggested two or three of the very many difficult questions that we had for consideration before our committee. My only conviction is that there are more real difficult questions to be solved in this committee which more vitally affect the people than are to be found before any committee of this House. Not only do we deal with the questions I have discussed, but with many others, all of which vitally affect the people.

The Post-Office Department is an intricate business establishment, and should be conducted along modern business lines. It needs as Postmaster-General a well-trained business man, the best that can be secured. He should devote his whole time and energy to the discharge of his important duties. It seems to me at present that a new Cabinet officer should be provided, known as the "secretary of political appointment," whose duties should be to make the recommendations for appointment to the President and Cabinet officers. [Laughter.] You gentlemen are aware of the fact that at the present time the important duties of determining who shall fill the appointive offices of the United States devolve almost exclusively on the Postmaster-General, and this far he has been so busy in making the appointments for other departments than his own that he has not had time to name his First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters-General. [Laughter and applause.] Now, somebody may consider that as being a reflection upon the Postmaster-General. Far from it. He can not help it. His friends say that he was one of the best First Assistant Postmasters-General that has been in that position for twelve years, a faithful and painstaking public servant. [Loud applause.] Grant it, this makes the situation the more deplorable. If this be true, a capable man is rendered inefficient by the unfortunate demands made upon him by the administration. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to occupy a very few moments of the time of the House; and I do so for the purpose of directing further attention to the subject of railway mail transportation. The country is very much disturbed over that branch of the public service. I do not recall the time when there was not criticism of that branch of the Post-Office Department; and I have never yet found the man who had studied the subject ever so much who would undertake to justify or explain the present system. The older members of the Post-Office Committee generally advise me that they do not believe that the total pay exceeds the value of the total service; and yet nobody can prove it; nobody can put his finger on the facts which justify or establish that proposition. On the other hand, I may say that everybody can take available figures out of postal reports and out of other railroad reports and prove anything he pleases in reference to mail transportation. The expert railroad accountant brings in his comparison between mail transportation, express transportation, and other lines of railroad movement, which demonstrates to a nicety that the railroads are headed for the poorhouse so far as railway mail transportation is concerned; and then our friends come in from all over the country with their figures, and show that the railroads are highwaymen and that we are all in cahoot in despoiling the Government open-handed in midday.

Now, the situation is so exceedingly unsatisfactory that it ought to be cured; and I have only risen for the purpose of directing attention to the matter, and to express the hope that a system of compensation to railroads for mail transportation may be discovered which we can justify.

A common rule of comparison is with the movement of express matter, but that is not a fair basis. It is admitted all around that railroads do not charge the express companies so much a pound as they do the Government, but on the contrary they get a percentage of the receipts of the express company—generally said to be 40 to 50 per cent. It is also known to all men that express rates vary much according to the value of the commodity shipped. If I want to send bullion, it will be weighed, to be sure, but the charges will be governed by its value and not by its weight except as the latter helps to fix the former. If I send valuable papers—stocks, bonds, deeds, and so forth—the express company cares nothing for the weight—value is the thing that counts. From these things of value the rates grade downward till for some short hauls the express companies can take some business away from the postal service.

As I shall show in a moment, the service to which a mail car is put is quite different from the use of an express car. The latter carries weight, the former does not. Anyone who has stood at a depot and seen the heavy weight but comparatively few articles of express matter which are taken on or put off and compared them with the many bags of mail must realize the difference between the two services. Heavy machinery, live animals, and full carloads, even whole train loads, of ore or fresh fruit are sent by express, and this volume of business is taken into account by the road and express company in agreeing upon rates and divisional percentages.

It may be mentioned incidentally, though I do not think the point is very important, that the express companies do and the Government does not exempt the roads from liability for injury to the employees in a wreck or otherwise.

If there could be any just comparison between the railroad pay for mail and express matter, it would seem as though it should be found in the movement of small articles or packages. The Government receives nothing weighing over 4 pounds in domestic mails. The Wolcott commission instituted an inquiry between mail pay and express pay on articles weighing 7 pounds or less, and here is the result—I do not know whether it is valuable or not; I give it for what it may be worth:

Paid to the railroads for 100 pounds.

[a] Seven pounds or less.

The Railway Mail Service divides itself into two parts: First, the mail which moves in carload lots out of the large cities, particularly about the publication days of the magazines. But out of the large cities I suppose there are mails in carload lots leaving the stations every day. I see no reason why a rate per ton or per ton-mile or something of the kind might not be discovered which would fit that situation and which we could justify before the country. But as to the general movement of mail cars, you can not possibly figure out what ought to be paid for their service by the weight which they carry. What is an R. P. O. car? R. P. O. stands for railway post-office, and that is what it is. It is a post-office on wheels. It is no more a freight car than a post-office is. There is no more comparison between what goes on in a railway post-office car and a freight car than there is between housekeeping and running a dray. As the train leaves the larger cities, there are from 6 to 12 or 15 men employed in a railway post-office car. The car is filled with long tables, some chairs, cases and pigeonholes on the wall, and racks to hold the bags, and those men are busy emptying bags of mail on the table and sorting it out and distributing it, ready to discharge at the next station the mail that belongs there. Then they receive the mail at that station, and the same thing is done again. As the train approaches a large city the men begin to throw the mail for that point into carrier routes, so that when the city is reached each carrier's mail is ready for him.

That is the occupation carried on in a railway post-office car. Now, if you were going to rent a building in which to carry on a work of that kind, you would not reckon the rent by the weight which the floor would carry. You would not take into account the size of the joists or strength of the building beyond knowing that it was an ordinary superstructure, and you would never think of reckoning the rent by the weight you might have in it at any one particular time; and that is the false notion or false basis on which our post-office system rests so far as transportation is concerned; and we will never satisfy the people of the country and never satisfy ourselves until we choose another basis. I am a new man on the committee. This is my first session upon it, and I am not going to undertake to pass out great chunks of wisdom to the older Members, but I am going to suggest to the members of the committee and of the House two or three possible standards that may be chosen instead of the present one. One would be the car-mile, paying according to the size of the car and the distance traveled. Another would be the car space. If you had a large car, pay in proportion to the space, but on that you have to reckon the distance also; so we might put these two factors into one item and call it "car mileage."

Or we might do as the British Government does, pay the railroads a certain percentage of the postage which we take in. I am not certain whether that would work out well, or how it would work out, but that is the plan adopted by the British Government. It gives 55 per cent of the postage received from merchandise—its parcels post. As far as I can discover, they pay nothing for first and second class mail, but it is predicated upon a percentage of the business, the same as the express transportation is in this country.

There is one matter in connection with car pay which is always a source of annoyance and aggravation. We pay nothing theoretically for the use of a compartment car; that is, where the car is divided and in one end there is baggage or express, and in the other a post-office, we pay nothing; but if we use the whole car, then we pay what seems to be a very large rate. Now, in the service last year there were 1,342 railway post-office cars. At the same time we were enjoying the use of 3,755 compartment cars. We paid nominally for the full cars and nominally we paid nothing for the others. Yet I fancy that if I were to go to a neighbor and say: "I want to hire your 2-horse wagon and will pay you for that, but I want you to send along three 1-horse wagons to carry some lighter loads, and I will pay you nothing for them," he would charge me enough for the 2-horse wagon so that he would come out about even on the deal. So that as a matter of truth we do pay for the compartments. In figuring on the subject the railroads reckon in the number of compartment cars that are furnished for which they nominally get nothing. When you take the pay for the cars and divide it by the number of full railway post-office cars, you get a figure that looks to be unfair, because it is very high.

Mr. WEISSE. According to these estimates the annual rental of a railway post-office car is about what the car would sell for, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of California. No; that is not true, and no one who has looked into the figures will make such a statement.

Mr. WEISSE. Do you think those old cars would sell for over $3,500?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think there is absolutely no foundation for the suggestion that the annual rental of a car is equal to the value of the car.

Mr. WEISSE. Do you think one of those old cars would sell for more than $3,500 or $3,600 after it has been in the service some time?

Mr. SMITH of California. I know what the gentleman is driving at. He is driving at that supremely ridiculous statement that has been made through the press over and over again. Now, the figures are bad enough, if you state the truth, but they can be aggravated in various ways. The Government designates the kind of car that shall be used. At the present time it is designating steel cars, which cost from $12,000 to $14,000 apiece, and the rent, or the total car pay, divided by the number of railway post-office cars, amounts to $3,517 a year. That is a high figure; higher than I should be able to justify. But if you divide the amount paid out by the number of cars, plus the number of compartment cars, you get $925 a year, with all the dangers of smashups and wear and tear and things of that kind.

Now, that may not be an unfair figure. Then I have estimated it in another way. I called two compartment cars equal to one railway post-office car, and took the railway post-office cars and added one-half of compartment cars and found that the annual rent is $1,469. That may be too large. But here is a state of facts that we ought to deal with, and in order to get at the true basis this theoretical notion that we will take the use of three cars for nothing and pay for the fourth one ought to be abandoned. Let us get on a rational basis and say to the people frankly what we are doing and put it on a plan that we can explain. When that is done I think there will be some peace in the people's minds. Until that is done I do not think there ought to be any peace. I do not complain because the people are complaining. They have a right to know and understand the operations of the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that on the cars there were from 6 to 12 men.

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; where they run out of the larger centers, but in the open country not so many.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask for my own information, is there any fare charged for those men on the cars?

Mr. SMITH of California. I was going to speak of that. That is an interesting factor. There are in the employ of the Government in what is called the railway post-office service 16,000 clerks. If you estimate that one-third are on duty at a time, you have got something like 5,000 men that the railroad is hauling up and down the country all the time. That is never taken into account in the estimate of the railroad pay. If we were to go to the railroads of the country and say, We want to mobilize the army, and for the next fiscal year we will have on an average 5,000 soldiers on the trains all the time, day and night, moving up and down the country, I guess you will agree with me that we would have a tidy railroad bill to pay at the end of the year. That is exactly what we do, and that is not all we do. The railroads not only furnish transportation for 5,000 men every hour of the day and night, but they furnish each of them a large workroom. They are not packed in like soldiers in the old cars, without berths, but they are given elbow room—a large table, chairs, and racks, the weight of which is three-quarters as large as the mail. Now, take your army of 5,000 men, and give to each man a good, comfortable workroom, and in many cases a place for his cot, and a place to prepare a meal when the train is going, and you see something of the service you are receiving from the railroad, and which it seems to be impossible to bring to the attention of the country.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of California. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it not true that the railroads not only furnish 5,000 men in the employ of the Post-Office Department with transportation, but there are also inspectors and other certificated men for which the railroads receive no compensation?

Mr. SMITH of California. That is true. In addition to the 5,000 men in the postal service, there are 500 or 600 post-office inspectors who travel upon their certificates, and that, I suppose, is taken into account in fixing mail pay. I do not look upon it is a gratuity from the railroads, all of which goes to show that it is entirely an erroneous system to pay the railroads by weight of the mail in the car; it can not be justified, and ought not to be justified.

I should add one further fact. The average weight of mail that is carried in one of the great cars is only two tons and a half; that is, in a 60-foot car, where there may be six or eight men at work manipulating the mail. The average pay in this country at the present time per car mile is shown to be under 12 cents. I do not know whether that is too much or too little; but I made this interesting calculation the other day: From my town to Los Angeles the mail car would earn $20.40. A car loaded with hay would earn $36.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has stated that the railroads apparently ought to be granted a credit for the hauling of the mail clerks in the car. The gentleman has evidently studied this proposition from all sides. Does he know whether the Pullman Company pay for the carriage of its conductors and porters?

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not; but I certainly would not like to have the United States mail service in any way compared to the Pullman-car service. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman acquainted with the fact that the Pullman Company is paid for the haul of its cars?

Mr. SMITH of California. I am not informed at all as to the Pullman Car Company's arrangements with the railroads.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say that it is.

Mr. FASSETT. Well, why should it not be?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman says that he has studied the question of railway-mail pay and that he can not come to any definite conclusion on some of the rates; that he has routed the mail from Los Angeles east. Now, the gentleman is aware——

Mr. SMITH of California. Oh, I merely mentioned the earnings per car in one case.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is a shipper. If he starts a shipment from Los Angeles east as freight or express, he pays a flat rate per pound. If as a government servant the gentleman should start 50,000 pounds of mail from Los Angeles east, does he know that he would not rate it at so much per pound; that he would not pay a rate at so much per pound, but that he would pay on this basis, for the first 5,000 pounds $171, for everything between 5,000 pounds and 48,000 pounds $20.30 a ton, and for the 2,000 pounds above the 48,000 pounds, up to 50,000 pounds, he would pay $19.24? Now, as a business man, does the gentleman think that is a fair way to compute the carriage of 50,000 pounds of mail?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I said at the outset that I thought we could reach a price on carload lots, and that would comprehend the 50,000-pound shipments the gentleman speaks of. I do not justify the present rate. What I am trying to bring to the attention of the committee is that we ought to set ourselves to the task of devising a new standard or measure of value in this service and then try to get things in harmony with it. [Applause.]

Some students of this question say that the Government should own the mail cars and not rent them. That is a detail. It is much like the question, Should the Government own all the post-office buildings required? I imagine that if we owned the cars there might be some complicated accounting with the roads for wreckage charges, repairs, and so forth. Under the plans I have suggested there need not be any car rental, and there should not be any now. There should be some flat rate of pay, and only one rate.

And now let me turn to another phase of the post-office question which has nothing to do with the subject of transportation. It is understood that within a few days the Senate will act, probably favorably, upon the postal savings-bank bill, and then it will be up in this House for consideration and determination. It is not my intention at this time to state what should be done with the bill, but merely to propound a few questions for the consideration of Members of the House, and possibly suggesting a few thoughts to our constituents at home.

The last Republican national convention resolved in favor of the establishment of postal banks, and it is well known that the President is anxious to have that promise carried out, as he is to have all the promises made by the party kept, but to say that one is in favor of a postal-bank law is about as indefinite as to say one intends to build a house or improve a farm. All of the details are then to be worked out, and the details are the important parts of the enterprise. So while the country may generally favor the idea of postal banks, I am certain that there are many details of the subject on which there are many ideas and differences of opinion.

I shall at this time content myself with asking a few questions, and replies thereto from Members of the House and also from our constituents may help us to reach a solution of this important problem.

First, then, should every post-office be a bank?

Should only the offices in the large cities where those of small means are most numerous be banks?

Should the opposite class only, the offices in country places, where there are no private banks, be open for this line of business?

Or should this point be left to the President and his Postmaster-General to decide, they to establish the banking business where they think best as they now decide what offices shall do a money-order business?

During what hours should the post-offices be open for the receipt of deposits?

Particularly should they be open for business during the evenings or later in the afternoon than the usual banking hours?

What additional equipment in the way of safes or vaults will be needed in the post-offices?

What would be a fair approximation of the cost of such equipment? (There are in the country 61,158 post-offices and 4,060 stations at the present time.)

Shall deposits be received in any amount?

Shall daily deposits be limited to a given sum?

Shall monthly and total deposits be limited or unlimited?

If one sells his crop, his live stock, or his farm and receives the price in cash, may he deposit it all with the postmaster?

Or shall these banks be conducted only for the receipt of savings—small sums at a time?

If the people of a community become fearful of the soundness of their local bank, should they be encouraged to take their deposits over to the post-office for safe-keeping?

What would be the effect along that line if there arose a period of distrust of banks generally as in the fall of 1907?

Should deposits be for a stated time, or be payable on demand?

Should they be payable on the written order of the depositor, or only to him in person?

Should deposits draw interest; and if so, at what rate?

Should money on deposit in the post-office be taxable?

Should it be liable to attachment and execution for debt?

Should the postmaster furnish a statement of deposits to the assessor or to the officer armed with a process?

What should the Government do with the deposits?

Should it deposit them in the nearest bank, or in the banks of larger capital; i. e., in the larger cities?

Should it require security of the banks for such deposits, or take the same chances as other depositors in the bank?

If a bank having postal deposits should fail, should the Government be a preferred creditor?

Should the Government demand interest on its deposits; and if so, how much?

Should it deposit its receipts where it can get the highest rate of interest?

Should deposits by the Government be made in national banks only, or in both national and state banks?

If deposits be made in state banks, should the Federal Government have the right to examine them as to their business methods and their solvency?

If the Federal Government be permitted to examine state banks and the examiner declares such a bank insolvent while the state examiner asserts that it is solvent, how shall the question be settled?

In other words, as between the federal and the state authority over a state bank, which should be paramount?

Can Congress determine that point?

How much in proportion to a bank's paid-up capital should the Government deposit with it?

If in the course of years the Government should find that deposits and withdrawals about balanced and that therefore it had constantly on hand a given sum—the common experience of banks of deposit—would it be wise to expend this sum in public improvements?

Finally, what will be the effect of postal banks on our present system of banks?

Will the former tend to crowd the latter, particularly savings banks, out of business?

If so, is that desirable?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Treasury of the United States is in a bad way. This has been the condition of the Treasury for some time, and the reformer is abroad in the land. There are those who seek to give a reason for this condition of affairs, and it seems that criticism to a very large extent has centered upon the Post-Office Department. I am not a special champion of the Post-Office Department. I have no more interest in it than any other of the 390 Members of this House, but it is true that in the eleven years that I have been a Member of this body I have given the very best work of which I am capable to the study of postal questions and helped to enact into law some propositions that make the postal service better and give to the people of this country what they are entitled to—the very best postal service in all the world. The intelligence of the people of this country can be measured and is largely attributable to the fact that we have a postal service, a free-school system, and a higher system of education, and a system of free institutions that is the best in all civilization.

As I find it, those who criticise the postal service center their criticism upon three points: First, second-class mail matter; second, the rural-delivery service; third, railway-mail pay. Perhaps it has been forgotten by the country that only three years ago the Post-Office Committee took action and amended the law in many and most important particulars, and the result was that more than $10,000,000 were saved to the Government in its annual expenditure for the postal service. Not only is this true, but we tried to incorporate into the law of 1907 what was commonly known as the "divisor;" that is, where the practice had been to weigh one hundred and five days and then to divide by 90, we endeavored in the bill we offered in the House to have that changed by law to require that the divisor be 105. We failed entirely in the House, but many of us thought, and some of us stated on the floor of the House, that new law was unnecessary, that executive order could accomplish that, and really, actually, and in point of fact the law at that time, as now, required the divisor, where there was a weighing for one hundred and five days, to be 105, so by executive order, ordered, as I understand, by a very distinguished gentleman then occupying the White House and who is now in Africa; at any rate, the change was made.

But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that but for the reform and but for the reductions which were made in 1907, three years ago, that to-day the post-office appropriation bill, which carries in round numbers for railway mail pay and railway postal-car pay about $50,000,000, that that amount would most assuredly exceed $60,000,000. Now, I am not prepared to say that in some cases railway mail pay is not too high; not at all; perhaps it is; but I am prepared to say that in some instances, and particularly on the short-line railroads, railway mail pay is too low. In other words, these small short-line roads do not receive a compensation commensurate with the service they perform, whereas, on the other hand, the great trunk-line railroads, over which lines is carried the great bulk of the mails of this country, many of them no doubt receive too much. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, to a very large extent, the law as it was intended, as it was framed, as it was understood at the time it was framed three years ago in reference to railway mail pay, has not been carried out by the Post-Office Department. We provided that the mail equipment, post-office supplies, and so forth, when in freightable lots should be withdrawn from the mails during the weighing period and thereafter shipped by freight.

Many of us supposed that 300 pounds and upward would be a freightable lot. Many of us argued it, I will not say where but in the only place we could argue it officially outside of this House, and many of us understood that freightable lots of mail equipment and mail supplies would be something like from 300 to 500 pounds and upward, but, Mr. Chairman, we were mistaken in our belief. We did not understand the spirit which moved the then Postmaster-General, not the present one. He ruled that only carload lots should be deemed freightable lots and ordered his subordinates to enforce the law accordingly. Little benefit, comparatively speaking, to what we contemplated was the result. Mr. Chairman, let that provision which has been the law since 1907 be carried out to the letter. I want to say something in this connection about rates on second-class mail. I would go one step farther and amend that provision of law providing that in addition to what is enumerated in the act of 1907 and which is carried in the present bill, in addition to postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspapers, wrappers, mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, I would add "magazines and periodicals" when in freightable lots.

Do this, Mr. Chairman. Amend the law in this way and you will withdraw anywhere from 30 to 35 per cent of the weight of mails during the weighing season, and let those items be shipped by freight, as they can be, and profitably, by the Government at a saving amounting to millions of dollars annually. How much I do not know, but I think almost enough to wipe out the present postal deficit of $17,000,000. Certainly the saving will amount to more than $12,000,000 a year.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. I will.

Mr. NICHOLLS. In your opinion, is it feasible for the mail to be weighed in each post-office where it is received and to be distributed daily and continuously throughout the year, classifying each kind separately and reporting in full to the Government at the end of each year, thereby having an accurate and exact weight of all and each kind of mail shipped or sent?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman the proposition is entirely feasible and practical. It is only a question of expense; that is all.

Mr. NICHOLLS. May I ask if the post-offices now have not in most of them, if not in all of them, weighing machines by which this can be done without any increased expense on that account?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman only the larger post-offices have the weighing equipment he speaks of. The smaller offices do not, as a general rule. In addition to this there would be increased labor and service required in the post-offices wherever that weighing was had, and of course it would require an additional force to the one now employed in the post-offices to do the work.

Mr. NICHOLLS. You do not think that work could be done incidentally as the mail was being received and divided up for distribution?

Mr. FINLEY. I am sure it can not be done incidentally, as the gentleman says, by the force in a great many of the post-offices of the country as they are now equipped.

Mr. NICHOLLS. If you will pardon me, just one word more.

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Do you not think, at any rate, it will be best for the Government and best for the service finally if the mail was actually weighed in order that this discussion, which goes on continuously upon this question and which arises at almost every session of Congress, could be settled positively and fairly for all concerned?

Mr. FINLEY. As I understand the gentleman, he would have the mails weighed for an entire year?

Mr. NICHOLLS. And continuously.

Mr. FINLEY. All the time?

Mr. NICHOLLS. All the time.

Mr. WEISSE. The same as the shipper weighs his freight.

Mr. FINLEY. Would we not then run into difficulty?

Mr. NICHOLLS. I will say to the gentleman I am not thoroughly informed on the postal situation, and I am really asking for information.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand the gentleman to say he would have this weighing go on all the time?

Mr. NICHOLLS. Yes; I would like to know whether or not it would be feasible. I am inclined to think it would be.

Mr. FINLEY. I am very sorry I can not agree with the gentleman. I think that would be an impracticable proposition. I think that the Government would pay out a great deal of good money for no good purpose and receive no practicable results in return.

I am entirely in favor of such weighing as will give to Congress and the people of the country accurate information as to the amount of mail that is actually handled in the country; I do not care if it would take a year. I would like to have that information myself.

But I was discussing the postal deficit. What is the loss on second-class mail? One of the most distinguished men in this country says that the loss is $64,000,000 a year. I believe that is also the figure given by one other official. Now, is it true? I for one do not agree to the proposition. I do not think so, and for this reason: The Postmaster-General, on page 9 of his report, states that the actual cost of handling daily newspapers—that is, the transportation, the mileage on railroads—is between 1 and 2 cents a pound. Now, if that is true, Mr. Chairman, then I submit that no such cost to the Government as 8 or 9 cents a pound can possibly exist, for the reason that the separation service of newspapers and periodicals and magazines is far less than that of first-class mail. In other words, I would say that the cost of transportation of second-class mail, taking the daily newspapers, is certainly one-half of the total cost. That is my view of it.

Now, to go back to the proposition I made. Amend the law. Add magazines and periodicals to this provision of law which I have read, and you will withdraw at least a third of the mail from railroad carriage, and hereafter it will be carried by freight, and at a cheaper and at a lower rate. So that you not only reduce the railway mail pay, but you reduce the railway post-office car pay, for the reason that second-class mail requires the greater part of the space that is occupied by the postal service in railway post-office cars. It is taken up by second-class mail matter, and to a small extent by third-class mail.

These are some of the views I hold. I have endeavored to be fair in expressing them. I believe them to be true. A great many people think that new law is necessary, and a great deal of new law, in order to reform the postal service. Gentlemen, is it not a fact that the postal service to a very large extent is subject to executive order? When you compare the postal service, as it is directed by law and as it is controlled by executive order, you will find that at least three-fourths of the instances it is a matter that can be controlled by executive order. Others contend, and I believe the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads is one of them, that we should have a high-priced man there as director, or as somebody having charge of transportation, one who has made a life study of this service, and so on.

I want to say that we have an expert in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's office to-day, the Hon. Joseph Stewart, who, in my judgment, is fully competent to deal with the question of transportation. Throw this office open to competitive examination to-day, and I believe he would hold his own against all comers and win out. He is one of the four subordinates, one of the Assistant Postmasters-General. These gentlemen are selected by the Postmaster-General. They carry out his policies. The Postmaster-General is selected by the President. The Postmaster-General carries out the President's policies. It is further contended that the Postmaster-General should have a long tenure of office, or, rather, that there should be somebody there who has or will have a long tenure of office.

This a government by parties, and I state this to be a fact, based on the one hundred and thirty years of the history of this country, that no Postmaster-General or other official will hold his office longer than he has the favor of the President of the United States. Suppose we should have a high-priced man at the head of transportation or in the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General. What guaranty is there that that office would be filled by one who is efficient and entirely competent? Why, Mr. Chairman, that office would be filled at the instance of ple-loving politicians in the House and Senate, and he would remain in office no longer than the powers that placed him there saw fit to retain him and give him their support.

Mr. Chairman, nine-tenths of the criticisms urged against the postal service or the complaints made that there is not sufficient law are founded in error and should be directed at the Executive. The President of the United States and the Postmaster-General by executive order can correct more than four-fifths of the complaints that have been made. President Roosevelt, as I said a moment ago, corrected the making use of a wrong divisor during the weighing period by executive order, or had it done. We have had during the present session of Congress a good deal of talk about increasing the rates on second-class mail. Now, I will say that I am not skeptical at all, not a bit of it; but I have my notions about some things. I have not had the slightest idea that there would be any serious effort made to increase the rates on second-class mail at this session of Congress, or at any time, for that matter. Not only that, but I do not think there should be. All the evils that are complained of are on account of the weight of magazines and other publications and the length of carriage that is given to these publications. That can be corrected by amending the act of 1907, as I have stated. So that you may rest assured that no proposition will come here for consideration to increase the second-class mail rates. Not at all. The G. O. P. elephant and all will shy at that. There are, however, a few individuals, including the chairman of the committee, who would not shy. He will not have an opportunity to shy.

The exception only proves the rule; and nobody is better aware of that fact than my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee.

But it is said that rural delivery is responsible for this last year's bird's-nest condition of the Treasury, or rather that the rural delivery is largely responsible for it. Why, it is said that last year the rural delivery lost to the Government something like $28,000,000. My only regret is that everybody who has made that statement did not first take the figures and go over them. According to the Postmaster-General's report the estimated revenue originating directly on rural routes is $7,250,000 during the past fiscal year. It is also estimated that mail originated elsewhere going to patrons on rural routes amounted to something like $12,000,000 last year. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this estimate is too low. Now, all the years that I have been here I have tried to study this one proposition particularly, and the best information that I have gathered from observation and from facts obtained wherever I could find them is that for every dollar of mail originating on a rural route two and a half times that amount is originated or created elsewhere on account of the existence of the rural route. But at any rate, if $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 originated elsewhere, add this, or three-fourths of it, to be perfectly fair, and I want to be perfectly fair, to the amount of $7,250,000; this would make it nearly $15,000,000, directly traceable to the Rural Delivery Service.

Not only is this true, not speaking at all with reference to the great benefits this service is to the country in the way of spreading intelligence, knowledge, and information, and keeping the people informed as to what is going on in their neighborhoods, but in the outside world, a benefit which can not be measured; yet there are other benefits that are so great that they can hardly be calculated, although they have a value in dollars and cents. There are 41,000 and odd rural routes in this country, serving a population of 20,000,000 and upward. I took the trouble to make a calculation of the value of the time saved. I know that the chairman of the committee will agree with me that time is money. Take the time saved by the country people on account of the fact that they do not have to go to the post-office, because the post-office is brought to their door, at $10 per year for each family, and it amounts to more than $40,000,000 annually in saving of time. In addition to this, patrons of rural routes live on farms comprising more than 200,000,000 acres. The institution of the rural delivery has brought a vast increase in the value of farm lands. I have made a calculation on this, and it amounts to the astounding sum of one thousand million dollars' increase in land values in the United States on account of the Rural Delivery Service. Four per cent on this would more than pay the annual cost of the Rural Delivery Service.

But it is contended strenuously by some people who are not well informed but are high in place and power that the rural-delivery system needs reformation; that it should be placed on a contract basis, the same as the star-route service.

Mr. AUSTIN. Before the gentleman proceeds to that, I should like to ask him if he has made a calculation of the value of a daily market report to the farmers, and also of improved road conditions?

Mr. FINLEY. I am very glad the gentleman called my attention to that, and I will refer to it.

There are those who believe that the Rural Delivery Service should be placed on a contract basis, the same as the star routes. I have endeavored to secure from those who believe that some good reason for the proposition. I have not obtained any as yet. The rural-delivery carrier to-day is an employee of the Government, under civil-service regulations. He is a clerk under his local postmaster. That is his official status. Not only that, but he is bound to obey and carry out to the letter the rules and regulations of the department. If he infringes these, if he does not perform his duties properly, he can be reported and generally is reported to the Post-Office Department, and he is disciplined and sometimes dismissed from the service. Not only that, but the department, by its regulations or practice, has provided that if the patrons on a route sign a petition giving any satisfactory reason why a rural carrier does not suit them or does not suit the service on that particular route, he may be dismissed.

I see over there my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LOWDEN], a member of the Post-Office Committee. He is the largest farmer in the House, and, in my opinion, when all of his southwestern lands are improved and have the Rural Delivery Service, he will be richer by more than a hundred thousand dollars in his land holdings. I am sure he does not join in this hue and cry to place the Rural Delivery Service on a contract basis.

No, Mr. Chairman, there is no good reason for this. I want to ask those who believe in this heresy why we should place the rural carriers on a contract basis.

Mr. WEISSE. In certain parts of this country you can hire men for $1.50 a day. In other places you can hire them for 75 cents a day. Do you think it is proper to pay a rural carrier the same price in a place where you can hire men for 75 cents a day that you should pay in a place where you have to pay $1.50? Is there any justice in that?

Mr. FINLEY. It always has been the rule and always will be the rule that when a person enters the government service and performs like service as some one else, he shall receive the same pay. My friend from Wisconsin, for instance, comes here as a Member of Congress. No doubt he is worth a great deal more to the country than I am, but I receive the same salary that he does, and he receives the same that I do. So that in government employment you can not discriminate and pay a man performing the same service a different wage to what you pay another man engaged in the same character of service.

Mr. WEISSE. Do you not think it is entirely unreasonable to pay a man the same wages in one place that you would pay in another where it costs nearly twice as much to live as it does in the other part of the country?

Mr. FINLEY. I have studied that proposition. In the South, no doubt, in the winter time the carrier has an easier time than the carrier in the extreme North; but there are corresponding disadvantages. If the gentleman will analyze conditions throughout the country, he will find that there is not so much room for taking a position like that as he imagines. I have no doubt that in the gentleman's country horse feed is a great deal cheaper than it is in my country. During certain seasons of the year it is almost impracticable for a rural carrier to perform his duties in the gentleman's country. The carrier in my country can perform his duties without interference from snow or weather, as a rule. Yet, if the gentleman's would compute the comparative expense of horse keep, he will find it is much greater in my country than it is in Wisconsin.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he would vote to pay a rural carrier 75 cents a day in his district and $2 for the same service in my district?

Mr. WEISSE. Provided you could hire other men at the same wages, I would, because I do not believe in taxing the man who earns 75 cents a day to pay another man $2 a day who could not otherwise earn 75 cents a day.

Mr. AUSTIN. In Tennessee as well as in Wisconsin the standard route is 24 miles, and the carrier is required to provide himself with a team, and he must be on that route so many hours regardless of the amount of mail he delivers.

Now, would you come into this House and vote that one of your constituents, carrying the mails over the same length of route the same number of hours, should not receive more than 75 cents and at the same time vote to give the rural carrier in another district $2 a day?

Mr. WEISSE. If I was going to run the post-office system in a business way, I would; if I was going to run it in a political way for plunder, I would not.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to proceed with my remarks. [Laughter.] The question the gentleman asked necessarily raises the question of what is the proper compensation for the rural carrier. I want to say that the compensation is to-day insufficient. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General stated in the hearings that probably the average cost of keeping a horse was about $20 a month the country over. A great many carriers on the majority of the routes that are 24 miles and over necessarily have to keep two horses, for the reason one horse is unable to perform the service. Perhaps he can feed those two horses on $17.50 each, or $35 a month. That leaves the carrier only $40 a month on a standard route of 24 miles. So we have it that more rural carriers resigned last year than at any time in the history of the service—2,526, as I remember.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I was going to suggest that, in addition to the facts which the gentleman has brought out so clearly, there are also the upkeep of the carriers' equipment and other expenses in addition to the actual feed of the horse.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; his harness and vehicle will cost him $50 a year. When you add to this the high price of living, it accentuates it. The question of the high price of living is of such general importance that the House and the Senate have taken it up. People all over the country have taken up the question. This question affects the rural carriers just the same as it does anyone else.

There is no doubt that he is not properly compensated to-day.

Along this line I may state that I have introduced and advocated elsewhere a bill giving to the rural carrier, on a standard route of 24 miles, a salary of $1,050, and for each mile in excess of 24 miles the sum of $43.75 in addition, and a reasonable allowance when he carries a lock pouch, so that, Mr. Chairman, when it is contended that the rural carriers of this country are overpaid the facts do not bear out the contention. In fact, the truth is absolutely and overwhelmingly to the contrary.

But I stand here to assert that the rural delivery is not responsible for the loss of $28,000,000 to the postal service in a year. Perhaps the service does not yield $28,000,000 of revenue directly, but when you calculate it directly and indirectly, taking the benefits to the country, if we couldn't have it otherwise, I would have a deficit of $50,000,000 rather than to dispense with it and deprive the American people of the great benefits that they receive from it. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, the condition of the Treasury is bad to-day. It is worse than it has been for a long time. The time was when it was argued here upon this floor that Republican rule meant a full Treasury, a surplus in the Treasury, and not a deficit, as we have to-day. I want to say that I am sorry that there is a deficit. I regret it. I wish to say, further, that the figures that are given in the Postmaster-General's report relative to the revenue from the Rural Free-Delivery Service are based upon figures taken in panic times, beginning with October, 1907. We had a stress of hard times in this country for something like two years. These figures were gathered in that time. If the figures were gathered to-day, I am sure the rural free-delivery service would make an infinitely better showing than is stated in the Postmaster-General's report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have stated my views with reference to the rates on second-class mail. I have stated how, in my judgment, the loss, whatever there is on this class of mail, can be wiped out, to some extent, at least. I have argued, and I believe successfully, that the Rural Free-Delivery Service is not costing the country $28,000,000 a year, and that I can not agree with those who believe that the Rural Free-Delivery Service should be placed on a contract basis the same as the star routes. The people down South know a good deal about star routes. We know what sort of service it is; that it is a little better than no service, but not much.

Now, I have not given the figures in relation to the post-offices that have been discontinued when the star-route service has been discontinued. All of this is to be added to what I have said in the way of revenue directly and indirectly arising on account of the Rural Delivery Service. Star-route service, rendered unnecessary by rural service, cost at the time of discontinuance $3,150,000 annually. To-day that service would cost four and a half millions at least.

The compensation of postmasters at offices discontinued on account of the Rural Delivery Service is estimated at $1,369,000. With the increased volume of business in the postal service to-day the compensation of the postmasters at these offices would be at least two and a half million dollars. These figures are to be added when you come to count up the cost and expense of the Rural Delivery Service, and amount to $22,000,000 in the way of revenue directly and indirectly and in the way of saving. But it is contended that the service could be made a good deal cheaper. Let us see about that. Second Assistant Postmaster-General Stewart states on page 134 and 135 of the hearings that the cost of the star-route service being let now and estimated for the future is 8.27 cents per mile. It is estimated that the cost of the Rural Delivery Service on star-route contract basis would be 10¼ cents per mile traveled. The cost of the star-route service is constantly increasing, so that the people who believe that a great amount of money would be saved in this way have not taken into account this fact. The present rate of cost per mile of the Rural Delivery Service is a fraction over 11 cents per mile traveled.

As to the postal deficit, I am not through as yet. Second-class mail, rural delivery, and railway mail pay are not responsible for all of it. On page 8 of the Postmaster-General's report we find that third-class mail matter cost the Government last year $3,229,522.12. Why does not somebody want to reform this? Why does not somebody take this in hand? Why confine their efforts and activities to the rural delivery service and to second-class mail? Free congressional mail, on this same page of the Postmaster-General's report, it is stated, cost the Government $518,385.45. Free departmental mail, mail sent out by the departments, cost the Government $5,219,661.65. All of this goes to swell the postal deficit. The registry service cost the Government last year, over and above the receipts from that service, $3,878,524.61. So that, Mr. Chairman, here are other branches of the postal service adding to the deficit, and why these have not been dilated upon and why they have not been exploited and held up to the country as adding to and increasing the postal deficit I do not know. Steps have been taken to decrease the loss from the registry service.

My information is that the cost of registering a letter has been increased from 8 to 10 cents by executive order. This only goes to show that a great many things can be done by executive order. A great deal of this deficit can be wiped out; in fact, every bit of it can be wiped out by executive order, and by carrying out that executive order afterwards in the administration of the postal service.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can tell us the cost of an express money order as compared with the cost of the postal money order?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have not a great deal of experience and have made no special study of that, but I have some information in regard to it. My information is that the express companies compete with the Post-Office Department in the matter of money orders, and, of course, the Government competes as best it can with the express companies. I for one would like to see the Government win out, but the postal service of this country is a great institution. It is not rotten. It is not going into the hands of a receiver. The American people, with all of the resources of this country, are behind the postal service, and they will continue to be behind it, and the man who lays his hand upon that service so as to cripple it in any material way will hear from the people to his detriment.

The total appropriations for the maintenance of the army and navy in the last appropriation bill amounted to more than $238,000,000. A great many people in this country, myself included, do not believe there is any necessity for these large appropriations. The army and navy do not bring a cent in the way of revenue to the Treasury of the United States. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that the statement of the United States Treasury at the close of business February 23, 1910, only showed a total balance in general fund, exclusive of the deposits made by national banks to retire circulation, of $29,789,435.50.

I repeat that notwithstanding this condition of the Nation's finances, and the hue and cry that expenditures must be held down, the Secretary of the Navy is advocating the construction of two battle ships of the largest type, costing $18,000,000 each. Why does not somebody set about reforming the military and naval service of this country, to the end that it will cost a great deal less money?

The estimates of the Post-Office Department, $37,345,000, did not contemplate any extension of the Rural Delivery Service. (See Hearings before the Post-Office Committee, p. 257.)

The committee finally increased this amount by $300,000, not enough by at least $500,000. Congress can not afford to take the position that there is no longer any demand or necessity for extension of the service. On the contrary large sections of the country, particularly in the Southwest, have little or no rural service.

There are other items in this bill that I have not touched, upon which I intended to make some remarks. I think the amount provided for clerks in city post-offices is insufficient. That is my belief and it has been my belief, and for this reason: The postal business is increasing; it increases every year; and now that the panic is to some extent passing it requires a definite and certain amount of force to handle the business in the post-offices where clerks are employed, the first and second class post-offices. There is a branch of the service which can be cut, where the number of employees can be reduced, and only the patrons will feel the effect. I allude to the city carriers. Take in the great cities in the business sections, where there are eight or more deliveries a day, where there are three or four or five deliveries in less important sections of the city, when you reduce the carrier force in the cities you necessarily bring about a reduction in the number of these deliveries per day. That can be done. I do not advocate it at all, but I simply call attention to the fact that it can be done, and no cut, as I remember, was made that would at all cripple the carrier service. As between that and the clerks in first and second class post-offices, it is the service that can be cut without detriment to the service, except as to the patrons of the post-office themselves, served by the carriers.

Mr. GORDON. May I ask about the salaries of the railway mail clerks?

Mr. FINLEY. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. In the classification act of 1907 it provided automatic promotion for clerks and carriers in first and second class offices. And at that time we increased the salaries of all railway mail clerks by $100. Since that time no direct increase has been made. In the present bill there is a provision that squints at giving the railway mail clerk an expense allowance when away from home.

Mr. GORDON. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. FINLEY. I think it is rather an awkward affair. I do not think it is perfection at all, not because it is not the work of my hands, not a bit of it; but there are two objections to it. First, I think the period that a railway mail clerk must be absent from home before he receives any allowance on this account is too long; and, next, the provision of law which is in the bill which is under consideration is temporary. In other words, it will not be permanent law even when passed by Congress, as it now stands.

Mr. GORDON. The allowance for this expense account?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes. It will not be permanent law, but it will rest in the discretion of Congress to renew it next year or not to renew it. In other words, this matter has been up for years and years, and I think the matter should be settled finally and conclusively. I think that these people should have an expense account.

Mr. GORDON. This is really experimental, then, for this one year? Is that the idea?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, I am not sure whether it is experimental or a dodging of the question. I am not sure about that. What I am in favor of is what is practically the recommendation of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on page 39 of his report, and I would put it in the bill if I had my way. By the way, I have not had my way in this and a great many other matters, and I never expect to have my way generally. I think this is starting on my eighteenth year as a legislator, here and elsewhere, and during that time I have learned to be pleasant even when I do not have my way. The following is the recommendation of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as I would amend it:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1910, the Postmaster-General, under such regulations as he may prescribe, may make a travel allowance in lieu of actual expenses to each railway postal clerk who is assigned to duty in a railway post-office, at the rate of 25 cents for each meal and lodging which, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, may be necessary for said railway postal clerk while he is traveling on duty away from his home and the initial point of his run, but such allowance shall not exceed $1 for any period of twenty-four hours.

That gives an expense allowance to those who are away from home and actually undergo expense. Now, it has been said here——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He states that he will be in favor of such a change in the law as will give to these traveling railway postal clerks reasonable expenses when they are away from home?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman state what reason is advanced against that reform? Is it merely a desire for economy, or is there any contention that such a claim is unjust?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no contention whatever that the claim is unjust. The principal argument that I have heard advanced is the objection of the condition of the Treasury; that we are now running the Government at a loss; that there will be a deficit this year; and that we can not afford to undertake this new departure. It would not cost a great deal of money. In fact, it can not cost more than Congress annually appropriates for the purpose, even under the amendment I have advocated elsewhere and advocate now, and which I will insert in my remarks. I hope I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. I have never heard any argument advanced why these railway mail clerks, traveling on government business, should not receive expenses while traveling, just as the traveling representatives of business houses are paid expenses when they travel.

Mr. FINLEY. And the post-office inspectors.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The post-office inspectors and other government representatives.

Mr. FINLEY. If there is any logical reason why distinction should be made, I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman the question, inasmuch as he is familiar with this bill and its provisions, if it carries a sufficient appropriation so that clerks will not be compelled in numerous post-offices in the United States to work over eight hours' time?

Mr. FINLEY. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, the bill does not.

Mr. AUSTIN. What reason is there that the committee did not provide for that?

Mr. FINLEY. The condition of the Treasury.

Mr. AUSTIN. The same old old story.

Mr. FINLEY. The same old story—economy and cutting down expenses. So the complaint is made, in at least some of the larger post-offices in the country, that the clerks are being worked considerably longer than eight hours a day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has any estimate been made to the committee of the amount of additional expenditure that will be necessary by allowing the railway mail clerks actual expenses while on the road?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like the gentleman to state it.

Mr. FINLEY. The department estimates it would require anywhere from a million and a half to one and three-quarter millions of dollars annually.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am amazed at that statement. I have had estimates made to me which base it at less than one-half of that amount.

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman's informant was in error.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not speaking now of any per diem, but the actual expenses incurred by these railway postal clerks while they are away from home.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman, from the best information I have, it would exceed a million and a half of dollars annually.

Mr. WEISSE. How many of them are there?

Mr. FINLEY. There are something like 15,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, the post-office appropriation bill now under consideration by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is one which is of more importance to the citizens of this country than any other bill that will be considered during this session of Congress. The business of the post-office is a sort of barometer which shows the condition of affairs throughout the country, as it is the first to feel the effects of industrial depression and likewise the first to indicate a return of prosperity in business. In every well regulated and successful business institution in this country it is found necessary to employ the best help that the market affords, and as an inducement to bring to their ranks the talent that makes any business a success, it is necessary to offer proper inducement in the way of compensation and the hope for advancement in the event of the employee making good in his position. That which applies to the commercial world should, in my mind, apply equally as well in the conduct of the government service.

Acting on the recommendation of the Post-Office Department officials, Congress passed a law reclassifying the salaries of post-office clerks and letter carriers, which went into operation July 1, 1907. The law provides:

That after June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class and carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary $600; second grade, salary $800; third grade, salary $900; fourth grade, salary $1,000; fifth grade, salary $1,100; sixth grade, salary $1,200.

It further provides:

That clerks and carriers at first-class offices be promoted successively to the fourth grade.

The law also provides that "no promotion shall be made except on evidence satisfactory to the Post-Office Department of the faithfulness and efficiency of the employee during the preceding year, and that all promotions of both clerks and carriers shall be made at the beginning of the quarter following the expiration of a year's service in the next lower grade." In the arguments advanced before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and before Congress it was shown that conditions warranted and required such new legislation. It was held that by the passage of such salary legislation it would be an incentive for faithful and efficient work, and make it possible to reward exceptionally faithful and efficient men throughout the service, and would enable the department to raise the standard of remuneration.

The clerks and carriers were led to believe that faithful and efficient service would be rewarded by promotion to the higher grades, with the result that the service was greatly benefited, as is shown by the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the year following the enactment of the new salary law. He said:

The passage of the reclassification act has undoubtedly infused into the great army of post-office employees a new spirit of enthusiasm for the service and of loyalty to the department, the effect of which can not be overestimated.

To conduct the postal service in the proper manner and maintain the high standard of efficiency that the public demands requires men of exceptional ability, and they should be paid accordingly. When an employee, whether a clerk or carrier, performs his service in a satisfactory manner and complies with all the rules and regulations laid down by the department, and by every test of efficiency required of him by the officials has earned a promotion, it is only fair and just that his services should be rewarded. Last year Congress in its wisdom saw fit to appropriate only sufficient money to provide for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks and carriers in the higher grades in first and second class post-offices. The result of this action has been anything but satisfactory to the officials and the employees, for the reason that a postmaster has been called upon in numerous instances to make a selection between two employees for promotion, each of whom had given equally satisfactory and meritorious service. The result has been that the clerk or carrier who failed of promotion was naturally disappointed and felt, and to my mind justly so, that he had been unjustly discriminated against. It is not fair or just to the department or to the postmaster to be compelled to withhold from the employee a promotion justly earned, through the mistaken idea of trying to save a few dollars through this spirit of what I believe is false economy. I believe it was the intention of Congress when they passed the reclassification act to provide for the promotion of every clerk and carrier who had earned a promotion, to the highest grades, and I trust that the Members of this House will vote to appropriate sufficient money to have that law put into practical effect. The increase in the cost of living affects these employees just the same as it does the Members of Congress and other citizens, and when we deprive any part of them from that to which they are justly entitled, I believe it is a great injustice.

SUBSTITUTE LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. Chairman, two years ago I drew the attention of the Members of this House to a condition of affairs affecting the substitute letter carriers of this country, in the hope that something would be done to relieve their condition. After the Members of Congress realize the condition of affairs surrounding this branch of the postal service, I firmly believe they will find a remedy. We read occasionally in our daily papers that an examination is to be held in the federal building for the position of post-office clerk and letter carrier, and the news item gives the information that the initial salary is $600 per annum and that automatic promotions are made annually until a clerk or carrier reaches the $1,100 grade if it is a second-class post-office and $1,200 in the event of it being a first-class office. Many young and ambitious men are induced to take the examination after reading the statement, believing that the position is an attractive one and the opportunities offered are better than is held forth in ordinary business. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, let me draw your attention to the actual facts as they exist. After passing the required civil-service examination and receiving a standing high enough on the eligible list to receive an appointment, the applicant is notified by the local postmaster to call on him at the post-office and is administered the oath of office in the regular manner. He is then told that he must procure a uniform at his own expense, after which he is to report for duty to the assistant postmaster or superintendent. The uniform being purchased, the young man, congratulating himself on his good fortune, reports at the post-office, only to find that instead of receiving an appointment at a regular salary he must first serve as a substitute for an indefinite period, and for which service he will receive a compensation of 30 cents an hour, and employment will be given him when regular carriers are off duty on their vacations or when they become sick or disabled and unable to perform their regular duties. This substitute service varies in time, but the average time served by substitutes throughout the country is three years, and during this period they average about $30 a month and are required to report for duty every day in the year if so instructed by the postmaster, and they receive no compensation whatever for the time they are required to lay around waiting for an assignment. The result of this condition of affairs is that competent and capable men, disappointed and discouraged with their lot, are not long in seeking positions in other vocations that offer better inducements, and are not long in finding them.

I ask the House to do something for the employees in this branch of the service, and make it attractive enough to induce the proper kind of men to continue in it. I am informed by one of my colleagues that an amendment will be offered which will allow these substitute carriers the time that they serve to count in their favor when they receive their appointment as a regular carrier. In other words, that a substitute appointed regular, having served as a substitute less than one year, shall be paid a salary of $600, his rating to begin at the time of his appointment as a substitute carrier.

A substitute carrier appointed regular, having served as a substitute one year and less than two, his entrance salary shall be $800, his rating to begin at the time of his appointment as substitute carrier.

A substitute appointed regular, having served as a substitute two years and less than three, shall be paid a salary of $900 his rating to begin at time of his appointment as a substitute carrier.

A substitute appointed a regular carrier, having served as a substitute three years and less than four, shall be paid an entrance salary of $1,000, his rating to begin at time of appointment as substitute carrier and the full limit of salary thereafter.

As such an amendment will not require an additional appropriation for this branch of the service, but merely provides that the time served by these substitute carriers shall count in their favor from the date of their appointment as regular carriers, I trust that this committee will look with favor on such an amendment, and that it will be accepted with the approval of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SUNDAY SERVICE IN POST-OFFICES.

Another matter I would like to draw the attention of the Members of this House to is the performance of Sunday work by clerks and carriers in free-delivery post-offices. In very other branch of the government service, if employees are required to perform Sunday work, they are paid double time for such service. The employees in post-offices, however, not only do not receive compensation for this Sunday service, but it is looked upon by the officials as part of their regular duty. I believe and maintain that these employees are entitled to one day of rest after six days of labor, and if it is necessary to employ them on the Sabbath day, they should be allowed one other day in that week in which to rest, so as to be better able to perform the duties required of them. The Sunday work in post-offices has attracted the attenion of the churchgoing people of this country to such an extent that the Lord's Day Alliance has taken the matter up and are advocating compensatory time off for these postal employees who may, of necessity, be compelled to work on Sunday. It is a recognized principle among all business institutions to allow their employees one day of rest in seven, and, to my mind, there is no good reason why the post-office clerks and letter carriers should not be treated in a like manner.

Mr. WEEKS. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the able speech of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in support of the bill showed not only absence of any provision to increase the rates of postage on second-class mail matter, but also the insertion of a provision to determine the competition of the Government with the printers of the country. While the law as it stands to-day may in a way be of service to many business interests, it is no proper governmental function to compete with any class of labor.

The action of the committee in these particulars meets with the wishes of my constituents, but in the meager pittance allowed for the extension of the rural free-delivery service and the failure to increase the compensation of the rural carriers there is reasonable ground for complaint.

I do not mean to charge that the committee has in any way intentionally discriminated in favor of mail facilities in the cities as against the country district, but an analysis of the appropriation carried in this bill convinces one that the rural communities have not got their just deserts.

The reports of the Post-Office Department show that there are 975 routes approved ready for installation, and yet the committee brings in an increased appropriation of only $285,000, which would barely allow the establishment of one new rural delivery route to a congressional district and no increase in the compensation of the carrier, whereas his net compensation is not equal, in many parts of the country, to the wages of the ordinary day laborer.

Those of us who live in a northern clime know the hardships these men have to endure during the winter months, often breaking the roads themselves through the snowdrifts, and, unlike the city carrier, they have no place to stop for a moment's shelter in the face of the storm; and let me say, from my knowledge of them, there are no more faithful employees in the government service, and the appeal which will be made on this floor to increase the appropriation for their compensation will, I believe, meet with a hearty response on both sides of the Chamber.

One of the greatest minds and the greatest railroad man in the United States, James J. Hill, recently, while reviewing the increased cost of living, has assigned as one of its leading causes the tendency of the younger generation to leave the farm and move to the city, thus diminishing the number of producers.

It should be the aim of every man on this floor to improve conditions in the rural districts, to make the homes there accessible, so that contentment should overcome or at least lessen that tendency. We should do everything in our power to increase the number of producers. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] did well to call the attention of the House to our party platform on the subject of extending the rural mail service, and I for one am old-fashioned enough to believe in carrying out the principles laid down in the party platform on this and other subjects. Personally, I attach more sacredness to the party platform than I do the rules of this House, which were introduced by a leading Democrat, Mr. FITZGERALD, and which could not have been adopted without Democratic votes.

The only defense that the Committee on Post-Offices makes for the meager appropriation in this bill is that a deficit exists in the Treasury. In face of the fact that nearly a thousand new routes have been approved and are ready for installment, and in spite of the pledge in our party platform and in view of the fact that in many of the large cities there are five or six, and in some even seven, daily deliveries, it will be difficult for Members of the House who represent rural communities and who have voted to furnish an automobile for the use of each of the presiding officers of the Senate and House, to explain to their constituents that they are to be denied any further mail facilities owing to the reason given by the committee. [Applause.]

There is another subject which is largely agitating the public mind, and that is the establishment of a parcels-post system. The members of the granges in my district have importuned me, the master of our state grange has written me in its behalf, and doubtless their sentiments reflect those of the members of the granges throughout the country.

Almost every country in Europe has had the benefit of this system. That it has worked advantageously and in the interest of the people is the universal testimony. Then why does this great progressive country of ours lag behind?

The late Postmaster-General, the present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Meyer, a man of rare intelligence and a great administrator, after giving the matter a searching investigation, became its warm advocate. A year ago last fall Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General De Graw, a capable and experienced official, brought the matter to my attention and urged my support of it.

Impressed by my research, I introduced on February 7 a resolution, of which the following is a copy:

House resolution 375.

Whereas a government parcels-post system has been in successful operation in several European countries; and

Whereas there is a strong demand by the granges and people of rural communities for the establishment of a properly guarded parcels-post system in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be requested to inquire into its feasibility and desirability and report to the House within thirty days.

By the term "properly guarded" it is intended to protect not only the interests of the local merchant, but also of the Government.

The House will notice that the resolution does not commit this body to the establishment of a parcels-post system; it merely requests the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to make an inquiry and report back to the House its conclusions.

The resolution has been for three weeks in the Committee on Rules. I have made repeated efforts to have it reported, but so far without avail.

With the general interest in the subject, the judgment of the House would sanction its being at least considered.

The action of the committee in keeping the lid on the resolution causes me to believe that every bill or resolution that goes to that committee which has not the visé of the House organization should be inscribed as Dante's Inferno, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since the gentleman has stated that he made repeated efforts to have his bill reported and failed, will he not just state what the efforts were? I am perfectly certain that he never spoke to me about his resolution.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman's memory fails him. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, it is one of my misfortunes that my memory seldom fails me.

Mr. FISH. I beg the gentleman's pardon; while sitting there in front, I came down and called his attention to the matter which they had before the committee, and asked him to get it out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman, I think, is under a misapprehension——

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is not under a misapprehension——

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). As to whom he spoke. The gentleman makes a statement about the Committee on Rules. Has the gentleman introduced a bill creating a parcels post and had it referred, as it should be, to the Committee on Post-Offices, where it could be considered?

Mr. FISH. The resolution which I have introduced speaks for itself, as well as the action of the Committee on Rules speaks for itself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will be frank with the gentleman and say that, if the resolution came before the Committee on Rules, I should not vote to report it, so that there may not be any misunderstanding about my position. If the gentleman wants to have the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads consider this question of parcels post—if, as he says, he has given careful research to the question—why does he not embody his ideas in a bill and get his bill considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads without the intervention of the Committee on Rules?

Mr. FISH. I will answer that inquiry by making another inquiry of the gentleman—why the committee has been keeping the lid on for three weeks past?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I controlled the committee, I would tell my colleague that I would keep the lid on, because, from the gentleman's own statement as to the character of the investigation he wishes made, I do not believe that any disinterested and honest committee of this House can make an investigation and prepare a report within thirty days as to whether a parcels post should be established.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman well knows that the committee had the power to make it sixty, ninety, or one hundred days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the gentleman in his resolution told us to have it within thirty days.

Mr. FISH. I stated to that committee that they could change the phraseology as they chose; all I wanted was to get the matter brought up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. I ask two minutes more, as I have been interrupted.

Mr. WEEKS. I extend the gentleman's time for five minutes.

Mr. FISH. I wish to thank the chairman of the committee.

This has brought forcibly to my mind how helpless a Member of this House is under such circumstances to get any bill or resolution reported, no matter how beneficent the measure may be.

Is such a state of things known in any other legislative body in any civilized country, with possible exception of Russia and Turkey? [Laughter and applause.]

In other words, a majority of the House may want a rule requiring a bill to be reported, and yet without the consent of three members of the Committee on Rules it can not be even considered by the House. To my mind this is not representative government.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will permit me, if he really wished an investigation of the parcels post, and real information, does he not think it would have been well to have introduced a bill on the subject which would have been referred to the proper committee to investigate that subject?

Mr. FISH. I do not want at the present time to enter into a discussion with the chairman of the committee. I have had a little experience with the committee on another bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman is quite right, that he had an experience with the committee on another bill of trifling importance, when the committee was devoting ten and twelve hours a day to the great appropriation bill now before the House.

Mr. FISH. But the gentleman would state, in reply to the chairman, that after he introduced the bill he was informed by a member of that committee that there was no precedent for the passage of the bill which he introduced, and he proved by the statement of the Librarian of Congress such was not the fact.

Mr. WEEKS. But the gentleman from New York will recollect that he spoke to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, who told him that he could have a hearing as soon as the appropriation bill was disposed of.

Mr. FASSETT. At the next meeting.

Mr. FISH. I will say in reply that I will take advantage of the first opportunity that the gentleman's committee gives me to be heard on that bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Perhaps it may not require any hearing.

Mr. FISH. As the gentleman from New York suggests, the bill which I introduced possibly may not require a hearing. It may at the hands of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, but it does not require a hearing at the hands of the people of this country, for they are convinced of its merits.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that no bill comes before the Post-Office Committee without a hearing by somebody. We do not do business in that way in that committee.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why does not the gentleman move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be taken up in the House?

Mr. FISH. Because I well know that there is no opportunity to discharge the committee. How can I get the opportunity to discharge the committee? One has that opportunity in every legislative body except this.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the gentleman knows that as a Member of this House he has that opportunity, immediately after the reading of the Journal, every morning.

Mr. FISH. No, sir; I could not get recognition for that purpose, and nobody knows it better than the gentleman from Minnesota, who belongs to the inner council.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman explain to the House why it is that he can not get recognition for the purpose?

Mr. FISH. If I had time enough I would go into that subject, but I prefer not to be interrupted at present. But I will say, if I may have the support of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the other gentlemen who are close to the throne, I will make that motion to-morrow morning. [Laughter.] If an opportunity is offered to revise the rules so that after a bill or a resolution has been in a committee for fifteen days or more it shall be in order, upon the written demand of, say, 175, or possibly 200, Members of the House to compel the committee to report the same, I shall unhesitatingly support such an amendment.

Anyone who keeps abreast of the current of public opinion must be convinced that the rules of the House will be liberalized during the present Congress or at the opening of the next, so that measures demanded by a majority of the House may not be chloroformed in committee, but brought before the House for consideration. Is it not, then, the part of political wisdom to amend the rules at the present session rather than endanger the Republican supremacy of the House by permitting it to be an issue in every congressional district?

My first knowledge of public affairs was gained when, as a young man, four or five years after the close of the civil war, I spent two years in Washington. The bitterness engendered by that strife had not been effaced; it even extended to a greater or less degree into social life. The Southern States were largely the prey of adventurers, and misgovernment was the rule rather than the exception in their statehouses, a deplorable incident of the reconstruction days.

What a wondrous change do I find upon my return! No longer a trace of bitterness; those great Commonwealths enjoying an abounding prosperity, their affairs well administered, and the Members of this House from all sections commingling. The man on either side who attempts to revive the passions and recall the bitterness of the past strikes no sympathetic chord.

While we have different political opinions, all are animated by a common purpose, the greatest good for the greatest number. In the brief year that I have been a Member of this House I count as one of my highest privileges the cordial relations I have established with many of the Representatives of the South, a section of the country which is so largely agricultural, and, therefore, has interests akin to those of many districts of the North. Let us, then, Representatives of those districts, unite in a common determination to see that our districts are given the benefits of postal savings banks, parcels post, an extension of the rural mail service, and adequate compensation for the carriers, and in so doing we will be fostering contentment and happiness throughout our common country and legislating for the welfare of the Republic.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that there should be a difference of opinion between my colleague [Mr. FISH] and myself as to whether he called my attention to the resolution to which he refers. Still, I will not assert too positively that I am correct in my claim, but will concede that he did call this resolution to my attention. If he had called it to my attention and showed the resolution to me, I would have suggested that if he desired the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to take up the question of a parcels post, the proper way to accomplish it would be to prepare a bill according to what he believed the proper method to create such a parcels post and have it referred to that committee.

While I have not given a great deal of attention to the question of the parcels post, from the divergent views entertained by many, I am quite convinced that it involves so many questions that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, engaged as it has been in the preparation of the post-office appropriation bill, could not have given it the consideration to which it was entitled within thirty days. But I doubt much whether this resolution was introduced with the intention of having it acted upon and reported, if the gentleman entertains the convictions which he says he does about the Committee on Rules, so much as it was to lay a foundation upon which he might make the speech which he has just made.

The gentleman stated that the rules were not sacred to him. They are not sacred to me, Mr. Chairman. Whenever I believe that changes which will improve the procedure can be made I shall be very willing to support changes in the rules. I have never seen a resolution introduced by my colleague proposing to change in a single particular any rule of this House; and that is all the more surprising, if he be not satisfied with them, although he voted for them, since he is not like a tyro in a legislative body, but has had wide experience, not only as an humble Member but as the presiding officer of the lower house in the legislature of the State of New York. It is a commentary upon the times that the gentleman should to-day inveigh so strongly against the powers of the presiding officer of this House, for, as I recall, when he was the presiding officer in the lower body of the New York legislature, the then incumbent of that distinguished office was not supposed to be permitted by those in control to exercise any independent judgment whatever. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say that there are in the Committee on Rules a number of resolutions upon different questions. I believe some of them should be reported. Some of them I would not support, either in the committee or in the House. I will not hesitate, however, to express my belief or position upon any resolution pending in that committee, whenever it is proper or whenever the occasion arises that I should. I have no hesitation in stating that I would not vote for the resolution introduced by my colleague under any circumstances. And moreover, Mr. Chairman, as to the gentleman's statement that it is not possible to get a resolution out of that committee, I wish to say that those who know and understand the rules of this House, if there be a majority of the Members anxious to accomplish what they seek, they can discharge any committee in this House from the consideration of any bill or any resolution. I make that assertion, based upon my knowledge of the rules of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain how?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall not explain to the gentleman now; some other time, perhaps. The rules are plain, and anyone who takes the time to study them and understand them can readily find out the way to accomplish what he wishes, provided a majority of the House is sincere in its desire to do what is proposed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I have come so often before this body with a plea for the rural carriers that I sometimes fear that I may try your patience. But whether, like the importunate widow of Holy Writ, I have been heard for my much speaking, or for whatever cause, we have from time to time on each successive appeal granted these good men a measure of relief. All that we have done, however, has been by parsimonious piecemeal, as if we were feeling our way with a doubtful experiment.

Now, let us ask ourselves the question fairly: Has the rural service passed the experimental stage? Is it a fact of our Government's administration?

The rural service has come to stay. This is the wealthiest Nation on earth, and it is wealthy because of the great variety and quantity of raw material produced by its agriculturists, the men who dwell in the rural sections. It is their brawn and brain that give us the balance of trade with the civilized world. On their labor cities are built and millions of artisans and professional men are sustained. All other wealth is but so much margin of profit on the original substance coaxed from the soil or reared on the farm.

The farmer is not an obtrusive person. For many years he submitted to every conceivable inconvenience in getting the semiweekly mail that the Government delivered at some remote office, while his neighbor in the city was having his mail delivered daily at his door. In the rural-delivery service the rural resident was accorded tardy recognition of his right to participate in the taxes he paid. The Government, recognizing as it must that its very roots are imbedded in the soil, can not turn backward in the rightful accommodation and uplift of its husbandmen. Is it not, then, and should it not be the policy of this Government to adequately support the rural service? I maintain and propose to prove a little further on in my remarks that we are not doing it.

I understand that the deficiency of something like $9,000,000 in the postal service is charged up largely to the rural free delivery. I would like to know by what process this conclusion is reached.

Is it not just possible that lax management by the Post-Office Department, rather than the rural service or the rate on second-class matter, is accountable for the postal deficiency? The President states that it costs the Government 9 cents per pound to carry second-class matter. The express companies as well as the Government are in the carrying business, doing business on the same trains all over this country. The express companies charge on second-class mail matter from Washington to Chicago, a distance of 1,000 miles, 2½ cents per pound on 50-pound quantities or more. For shorter distances the price is about half as much, and for across-continent transportation about twice as much. In the longest haul that an express company can possibly make it does not charge exceeding 6 cents per pound for second-class matter. This is based on the express company's general schedule of rates, while it is compared with the lowest article on the government rate. Does anybody believe that the express companies are operating at a loss? One of them only recently distributed $17,000,000 in dividends to its stockholders. They have made no concessions to newspaper or periodical men. They have simply used business methods in making their schedules, and it is hard to conceive of a more profitable business than they are conducting.

Here is a specimen of the Government's lack of business methods: "The Government is paying an annual rental of $3,000 each per year for the use of postal cars which cost the railroads less than $7,000 each to buy." If the Government is to be held up in this way by the railroads, had it not better suspend building battle ships for a while and devote its attention to the building of postal cars?

If the Post-Office Department does not pay, neither does the War Department nor the Navy Department, measured in dollars and cents. If it is important to protect our country from the invader, without reference to the hundreds of millions expended in the sinews of war, and despite the fact that we are enjoying profound peace with the world, surely a small deficit charged to the postal service, its agency for the enlightenment and elevation of its citizenship, is not misappropriated. But I verily believe that if business methods are substituted by the Government for political preferment all shortages in the Post-Office Department will be wiped out.

While I have not the figures at hand, I know as a fact that the rural service has stimulated correspondence by rural residents until it has more than doubled in the last decade. It has abolished thousands of small post-offices with the salaries on cancellations allowed the postmasters. It has driven out the equally expensive and unsatisfactory star-route system. When the service is credited with the stimulated correspondence and the pay of postmasters and star-route carriers, I believe that its account with the Government would be balanced. But its greatest value as a revenue producer is in none of these, and for this the system receives not one cent of credit. The largest revenue derived from the rural system is from response to rural correspondence. There is the letter advertising goods, then the letter acknowledging receipt of orders, then the letter making prices on specific articles, then the letter notifying that the article has been sent, and, finally, if the package is one that can be carried in the mail, the article itself is so sent. All of this has been stimulated more than a hundred per cent, and yet the Rural Delivery Service is not credited with one cent on account of it. It is reflected in the larger post-offices, and there, too, the credit goes. Post-offices are rapidly advanced to third and second class offices and postmasters' salaries are increased accordingly, but no thought is given to the humble carrier, who through the snows of winter and the scorching heat of summer has made his ceaseless rounds, building up the revenue of the service.

I have said that the rural carriers are poorly paid. Let us see if the facts do not bear out this assertion. In many instances they are forced to keep two horses, but I have not singled out such for the purpose of my argument. I have received from many of the carriers of my district their actual expense account for six months, covering the following items: Horse feed, blacksmithing, veterinary, repairs to vehicles, repairs to harness, depreciation of vehicles and harness, depreciation and death of horses, blankets and robes, and interest on outlay at 6 per cent. For convenience I have taken at random the accounts of nine carriers of my district, with this result: The nine carriers received as pay for six months $3,645, and they incurred expenses aggregating $1,915.25. This means that these men, whose work is more trying than that of any official in the government service, received pay which averaged $192.19 for six months' service. I may add that in looking over the expense account I noted no dead horses and no extraordinary or large item entering into it. Take out of this pitiful sum of $192.19 the scanty support of the carrier, and perhaps of a family, and think what his plight must be at the end of six months. Now, these are homely facts that I am bringing to your attention; but since they are facts they must appeal to every conscientious Representative on the floor of this House.

Conditions in the district that I have the honor to represent are not different from those prevailing over the entire country. A statement covering 42 States and practically every district in which the rural service is in operation, shows that the average net earnings of the thousands of carriers employed for six months, closing December 31, 1909, after deducting maintenance of equipment, was $189. Live stock has advanced fully 50 per cent; harness and equipment have advanced fully 50 per cent; horse feed, especiall corn and oats, has advanced 100 per cent; provisions have advanced in many articles—meat, for instance—300 per cent; and yet the carrier is expected to support himself and family out of the small sum of $189 for six months. Such parsimony is unworthy of a Government that looks, or should look, first to efficiency.

I ask now, Is the Government so parsimonious in dealing with its officers and agents generally? We maintain an army of clerks, many of whom have only nominal duties; we maintain officers of the army and navy in splendor until old age overtakes them, and then we retire them on munificent salaries; we maintain a system of public schools in the far-away Philippine Islands for the uplift of the alien. In a word, we spend annually over a billion dollars, much of which is wasted in the vain effort to become a colonial power. Could we not at least be just to our own rural inhabitant who furnishes the sinews of government and to his immediate servant, the rural carrier?

I feel almost ashamed to place the demand for the rural service on the mere plane of revenue, though I believe that it can be more than sustained on this plane.

Since a country is prosperous directly in proportion to the number and intelligence of its producing class, it is of most vital importance that the producer be content and that his numbers be not reduced. I do not believe that any single agency has done so much to satisfy the producer with his surroundings as a daily mail, bringing him into immediate touch with the pulse throbs of the outside world. It has linked the country with the town, and when a few other agencies, such as the telephone and the trolley, have more generally contributed their part to this great work, we will see life in the country restored to that preeminence that characterized it for so many years in England; and the popular tide will be from the towns to the rural sections.

Believing that the rural carrier is to-day one of the greatest conservative agents in the service of the Government, I favor increase of his pay until he is placed on an equal footing with his brother carrier in the city, and I shall favor any proposition looking to that end.

If we can not get but $1,000 maximum for him, I shall vote for that amount. If we can get $90 per month for him for standard 24-mile routes, I shall vote for that amount. One of the first bills that I introduced in this House and the first speech I made here were to secure an increase of the carrier's pay. I was convinced of the justice of his cause then, and though much has been accomplished much more is due this faithful servant of the people.

The pay for the service as carrier is so small that there are more resignations from this branch of the service than from the whole government service beside. But they are not dismissed for nonperformance of duty. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and Mr. FASSETT having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that that committee had come to no resolution thereon.

INVESTIGATION OF COAL LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 390), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, reports rendered in connection with the investigation to determine the extent and value of the coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in Oklahoma, which investigation has been made under the direction of the Department of the Interior, pursuant to the act of June 21, 1906, which provides in part as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make practical and exhaustive investigation of the character, extent, and value of the coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in Indian Territory; and the expense thereof, not exceeding the sum of $50,000, shall be paid out of the funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That any and all information obtained under the provisions of this act shall be available at all times for the use of the Congress and its committees.

There are also inclosed memorials of the Choctaw Nation, protesting against the payment of the expenses of this investigation from the tribal funds and requesting the United States to purchase the surplus and undivided property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. BROWN. I present a letter from Senator ROOT to Hon. Frederick M. Davenport, a member of the legislature of New York, relative to the proposed income-tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 398).

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed as a document and also in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1910.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since our conversation last month I have given much consideration to the scope and effect of the proposed income-tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Much as I respect the opinion of the governor of the State, I can not agree with the view expressed in his special message of January 5, and as I advocated in the Senate the resolution to submit the proposed amendment, it seems appropriate that I should state my view of its effect.

The proposed amendment is in these words:

"ARTICLE 16. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration."

The objection made to the amendment is that this will confer upon the National Government the power to tax incomes derived from bonds issued by the States or under the authority of the States and will place the borrowing capacity of the State and its governmental agencies at the mercy of the federal taxing power.

I do not find in the amendment any such meaning or effect. I do not consider that the amendment in any degree whatever will enlarge the taxing power of the National Government or will have any effect except to relieve the exercise of that taxing power from the requirement that the tax shall be apportioned among the several States. The effect of the amendment will be, in my view, the same as if it said, "The United States may lay a tax on incomes without apportioning the tax, and this shall be applicable whatever the source of the income subjected to the tax," leaving the question "What incomes are subject to national taxation?" to be determined by the same principles and rules which are now applicable to the determination of that question.

If we were to construe the proposed amendment only by a critical examination of its words, the view upon which the objection is based would be reached by practically cutting the provision in two and reading it as if it read, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived," without the concluding words. But we are not at liberty to do this. The amendment consists of a single sentence, and the whole of it must be read together. It expresses but a single idea, and that is that the tax to which it relates must be laid and collected without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration, while the words "from whatever source derived" are obviously introduced to make the exemption from the rule of apportionment comprehensive and applicable to all taxes on incomes.

We are not left, however, to a mere critical examination of words. This provision, as Mr. Justice Bradley said of the Constitution, in the Legal Tender cases, is "to be interpreted in the light of history and of the circumstances of the period in which it was framed." Justice Story said of another clause of the Constitution, in Brisco v. The Bank of Kentucky (11 Pet., 332):

"And I mean to insist that the history of the colonies, before and during the Revolution, and down to the very time of the adoption of the Constitution, constitutes the highest and most authentic evidence to which we can resort to interpret this clause of the instrument; and to disregard it would be to blind ourselves to the practical mischiefs which it was meant to suppress, and to forget all the great purposes to which it was to be applied."

This view must necessarily be applied to the proposed amendment if it be adopted. It will be construed in the light of the judicial and political history which led to the proposal and which appears upon the public records of our Government.

What is that history? The Constitution of 1787 conferred upon the National Government the power of taxation without any limit whatever except that taxes on exports were prohibited.

The method of exercising the power, however, was subjected to two limitations. One, that imports, duties, and excises should be uniform, and the other, that direct taxes should be apportioned among the States. The apportionment provisions were as follows:

Article I, section 2:

"Representative and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers," etc. (Amended, but not in this respect, by the fourteenth amendment.)

Article I, section 9:

"No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken."

For more than a hundred years after the adoption of the Constitution various tax laws of Congress were from time to time brought before the courts upon objections that they imposed direct taxes in violation of the rule of apportionment. The decisions of the courts uniformly sustained these laws, from the Hylton case, in 1796, which sustained an unapportioned tax on carriages (3 Dall., 171), to the Springer case, in 1880, which sustained an unapportioned tax on incomes (102 U. S., 586).

In the meantime numerous laws were passed and enforced imposing taxes on incomes without apportionment; and a great part of the means for carrying on the civil war was derived from such taxes.

In the year 1895, however, an income-tax law, included in the Wilson tariff act of 1894, was brought before the Supreme Court in the case of Pollock v. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, and in that case the court decided against the law. The case was heard twice. On the first hearing a majority of the court held that a tax on income derived from real estate must be apportioned as a direct tax, because a tax on real estate itself would be direct; and the judges divided equally as to whether a tax on income derived from personal property must be apportioned (157 U. S., 429).

Upon the second hearing of the case the court, by a majority of five to four, held that a tax upon income derived from personal property must be considered a direct tax and must be apportioned (158 U. S., 601). All the judges agreed, however, that taxes on incomes derived from business or occupations need not be apportioned. The effect of these decisions was thus described in one of the minority opinions:

"But the serious aspect of the present decision is that by a new interpretation of the Constitution, it so ties the hands of the legislative branch of the Government, that without an amendment of that instrument, or unless this court, at some future time, should return to the old theory of the Constitution, Congress can not subject to taxation—however great the needs or pressing the necessities of the Government—either the invested personal property of the country, bonds, stocks, and investments of all kinds, or the income arising from the renting of real estate, or from the yield of personal property, except by the grossly unequal and unjust rule of apportionment among the States. Thus, undue and disproportioned burdens are placed upon the many, while the few, safely intrenched behind the rule of apportionment among the States on the basis of numbers, are permitted to evade their share of responsibility for the support of the Government ordained for the protection of the rights of all."

It was so evidently impossible to collect an income tax by apportionment among the States according to population that the general judgment of the country confirmed the opinion that the decision in the Pollock case had practically taken away from Congress a power of vital importance to the General Government—a power the exercise of which had, at least in one time of peril, proved essential to the Nation's life.

The attention of the country was sharply called to the need of more government revenue for the first time after the Pollock case by the decrease of customs and internal-revenue receipts and the rapidly mounting deficit which followed the financial panic of 1907; and in the extraordinary session of Congress which began March 15, 1909, when the revised tariff bill came into the Senate, an amendment to the bill was introduced, reproducing in substance the old income-tax provisions of 1894, which the Supreme Court had held to be invalid, both as to income derived from real estate and as to income derived from personal property.

The avowed and necessary effect of including such provisions in the new tariff law would be to present again to the Supreme Court the same questions which had been decided in the Pollock case and to challenge a reversal of their decision. Thereupon the resolution for the submission of this amendment was introduced in the Senate and was passed by Congress.

The proposal followed the suggestions of the Supreme Court in the Pollock case.

The evil to be remedied was avowedly and manifestly the incapacity of the National Government resulting from the decision that income practically could not be taxed when derived either from real estate or from personal property, although it could be taxed when derived from business or occupation.

The terms of the amendment are apt to cure that evil and to take away from the different classes of income considered by the court a practical immunity from taxation based upon the source from which they were derived.

There was no question in Congress or in the courts or in the country about the taxation of state securities. No one claimed that the inability of the General Government to tax them was an evil. The inability to tax them did not arise from the terms of the Constitution, but from the fact that, being the necessary instruments of carrying on other and sovereign governments, they were not the proper subject of national taxation, and that therefore no provisions of the Constitution, however wide the scope of their language, could be held to apply to such securities or to the income from them. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, says:

"The power to tax, whether by the United States or by the States, is to be construed in the light of and limited by the fact that the States and the Union are inseparable, and that the Constitution contemplates the perpetual maintenance of each with all its constitutional powers, unembarrassed and unimpaired by any action of the other. The taxing power of the Federal Government does not therefore extend to the means or agencies through or by the employment of which the States perform their essential functions, etc."

This rule of construction has been maintained for generations. It is undisputed; it was referred to with approval by the justices who wrote and delivered the opinions in the Pollock case both for and against the judgment. It has been declared again and again by the Supreme Court to be not open to question. It is a rule of construction just as controlling in defining the scope of the proposed amendment as it is in defining the scope of the existing provisions. Under it, from the earliest times of our Government, the apparently unlimited taxing power conferred by the terms of the Constitution has been held not to apply to the instrumentalities of the State. Under it acts of Congress which, by their express terms, appeared to include instrumentalities of state government have uniformly been held not to include them.

This uniform, long-established, and indisputable rule applied to the construction of our Constitution—a rule which has been declared to be essential to a continuance of our dual system of government—forbids that the words of that instrument conferring the power of taxation shall be deemed to apply to anything but the proper subjects of national taxation. Under it we are forbidden to apply the words "from whatever source derived" in the proposed amendment to any of the instrumentalities of state government.

This amendment will be no new grant of power. The Congress already has power to impose taxes on incomes from whatever source derived, subject to the rule of construction which excludes state securities from the operation of the power, but the taxes so imposed must be apportioned among the States. Under the proposed amendment there will be the same and no greater power to tax incomes from whatever source derived, subject to the same rule of construction, but relieved from the requirement that the tax shall be apportioned.

It appears, therefore, that no danger to the powers or instrumentalities of the States is to be apprehended from the adoption of the amendment.

It would be cause for regret if the amendment were rejected by the legislature of New York.

It is said that a very large part of any income tax under the amendment would be paid by citizens of New York. That is undoubtedly true, but there is all the more reason why our legislature should take special care to exclude every narrow and selfish motive from influence upon its action and should consider the proposal in a spirit of broad national patriotism and should act upon it for the best interests of our whole country.

The main reason why the citizens of New York will pay so large a part of the tax is that New York is the chief financial and commercial center of a great country, with vast resources and industrial activity. For many years Americans engaged in developing the wealth of all parts of the country have been going to New York to secure capital and market their securities and to buy their supplies. Thousands of men who have amassed fortunes in all sorts of enterprises in other States have gone to New York to live, because they like the life of the city or because their distant enterprises require representation at the financial center.

The incomes of New York are in a great measure derived from the country at large. A continual stream of wealth sets toward the great city from the mines and manufactories and railroads outside of New York. The United States is no longer a mere group of separate communities embraced in a political union; it has become a product of organic growth, a vast industrial organization covering and including the whole country; and the relation of New York City to the whole organization of which it is a part is the great source of her wealth and the chief reason why her citizens will pay so great a part of an income tax. We have the wealth because behind the city stands the country. We ought to be willing to share the burdens of the National Government in the same proportion in which we share its benefits.

The circumstances that originally justified the establishment of the rule of apportionment in the Constitution have long since passed away. It is universally conceded that its application to existing conditions would be so unjust and inequitable as to be impossible. The power of taxation which the rule makes it impossible for the Nation to exercise may be again, as it has once been, vital to the preservation of national existence. It would be most unfortunate if the several States of the Union were to insist upon the continuance of this unjust and useless limitation upon the necessary powers originally and wisely granted to the National Government.

With kind regards, I am always,

Very sincerely, yours, ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT,
Senate Chamber, Albany, N. Y.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11421) for the relief of R. J. Warren, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

LEVEE STEAM COTTON PRESS COMPANY.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 191), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 191.

Resolved, That the bill (S. 6245) entitled "A bill for the relief of the Levee Steam Cotton Press Company, of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana," now pending in the Senate, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

ST. CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6449) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 298) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, lines 5 and 6, to strike out the words "its successors or assigns;" in line 7, after the words "St. Croix River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation;" to strike out all of section 2 of the bill on page 2, and to renumber section 3 to stand as section 2, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Wisconsin Central Railway Company, a railway corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to build a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation from a point on the east bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between townships 30 and 31 north, in St. Croix County, Wis., to a point on the west bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between said townships 30 and 31 north, in Washington County, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 196, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "forty-seven thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 200, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 86 of the bill, in line 1, after the word "children," insert the following: "(white and colored);" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 201, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "seventy-two thousand two hundred and sixty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 206, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "thirteen thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 207, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "twenty-four thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 211, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "forty-seven thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 219, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment, after the word "hereby," strike out the words "and hereafter;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 221, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Toward the extension of water trunk mains to Congress Heights, D. C., said sum to be in addition to the sums herein appropriated from the revenues of the water department, $50,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 222, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"For the extension of 12-inch water main from Elliot place along the Conduit road to Weaver terrace, and for laying 8-inch water mains in Forty-seventh place, Ashby street, Edmund street, and Sherrier place, said sum to be in addition to the sums herein appropriated from the revenues of the water department, $24,000: Provided, That assessments for water mains hereinbefore provided for shall be levied in accordance with the provisions of an act approved April 22, 1904, entitled 'An act authorizing the laying of water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia, the levying of assessments therefor, and for other purposes:' And provided further, That all such assessments when collected shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the revenues of the United States in equal parts."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
S. B. ELKINS,
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WASHINGTON GARDNER,
E. L. TAYLOR, Jr.,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a brief statement, which I desire to have appear in the RECORD following the conference report.

The statement referred to is as follows:

District of Columbia appropriations, 1911.

Amount of estimates, 1911		$11,180,628.49
Amount of Senate bill		11,012,960.99
Amount of House bill		10,258,067.99
Amount in disagreement		754,893.00
Amount of Senate recessions	$387,535
Amount of House recessions	367,358
		754,893.00
Amount of House bill as agreed upon		10,625,425.99

INVESTIGATION OF WAGES AND PRICES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a statement of the lines of inquiry which were agreed upon by the committee appointed to inquire into wages and prices. That committee met on Saturday and adopted a statement of certain lines of inquiry which they meant to pursue. They gave the statement to the press. The press, however, on Sunday is so overwhelmed with valuable matter that it found it necessary to condense the statement of the committee. The committee had given some time to the statement, and it was as condensed as possible. The result was that those who were kind enough to further condense it, with their natural horror of superfluous language, cut out essential parts of the very brief statement which the committee had made.

For example, the committee had put down as one line of inquiry, prices of food products, at the farm, at wholesale, at retail. The press omitted "at the farm, at wholesale, at retail," and left simply "prices of food products," which would mean that we were going to gather a mass of uncompared and unimportant figures which would have no purpose or object. They also left out entirely the list of articles specified in the resolution, such as cotton, wool, hides, leather, and so forth. I had inquiries from Senators yesterday, who had seen only what appeared in the newspapers, asking whether we were not going to look into the prices of oil, coal, and so forth.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask that the statement may be printed in the RECORD, where, at least, it will be printed in its completeness. It will occupy only a few paragraphs. Fortunately, space in the RECORD is not so valuable as it is in the Sunday newspapers.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Prices of food products:
a. At the farm.
b. At wholesale.
c. At retail.

So far as possible show prices by years from 1900 to the present time.

2. The price of manufactured articles:
a. At the factory.
b. At wholesale.
c. At retail.

So far as possible show prices by years from 1900 to the present time.

3. Cotton, wool, hides, leather, lumber, coal, iron, steel, oil, brick, cement, and farming implements:
a. Initial price at point of production.
b. Wholesale price.
c. Retail price.

So far as possible show prices by years from 1900 to the present time.

4. The effect of combinations upon the prices of commodities.

5. The effect of cold-storage plants upon prices, and their methods of doing business.

6. Invoice price and market price in April, 1909, of all imported articles mentioned in the tariff.

7. Invoice and market price at the present time of imported articles mentioned in the tariff.

8. Foreign wholesale and retail prices at the present time, and so far as possible by years from 1900.

9. Wages and salaries at home and abroad by years from 1900 to 1910.

10. The production of gold and the additions to the gold coinage by years from 1897 to the present time, both in the United States and in the world.

11. World's prices of commodities by years from 1897 to the present time.

12. Procure and tabulate all information possible to be obtained from the United States Consular Reports, the Reports of the British Board of Trade, and similar official reports of other countries, the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, the London Economist, and the London Statist, and other journals of high standing which give statistics as to wages and prices by years from 1897 to 1910.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6072) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which were, on page 2, to strike out line 11, down to and including line 14, page 2; on page 7, to strike out line 9, down to and including line 12, page 7; and on page 25, to strike out line 18, down to and including line 21, page 25.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendments propose to strike out two items where the beneficiaries have died since the bill passed the Senate, and one case of remarriage. I move that the amendments of the House be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 16915. An act to direct that Jefferson street NW., between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue, be stricken from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 20164. An act authorizing the extension of Military road NW., in the District of Columbia.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR JOHNSON.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at this time I wish to ask unanimous consent that Saturday, the 2d day of April next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, may be set aside in order that the Senate may pay just tribute to the memory of Hon. MARTIN N. JOHNSON, late Senator from the State of North Dakota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR M'LAURIN.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on the same day, immediately after the exercises commemorative of the late Senator JOHNSON, of North Dakota, I will offer resolutions commemorative of the character and life of my late colleague, the Hon. ANSELM J. MCLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 3724) regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1630) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington property was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

WALES ISLAND PACKING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1035) authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to examine and settle the claim of the Wales Island Packing Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. The bill has been read. I think it is a very meritorious case.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of State to examine the claim of the Wales Island Packing Company for injury to its business and property on Wales Island on account of the recent decision of the Alaska boundary tribunal, under which the possession of the island has passed from the United States to the Dominion of Canada, and allow to the company whatever sum may be found due, not exceeding $81,689.60.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (H. R. 12316) to provide for the government of the Canal Zone, the construction of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 5485) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make temporary withdrawals of areas of public land pending report and recommendation to Congress or for examination and classification, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill goes over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It goes over by unanimous consent granted on the 16th of February that it should not be considered in the absence of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

EXTENSION OF MORRILL ACTS TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 530) to amend an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto, so as to extend the benefits thereof to the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the bill go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon an objection. The bill has been reached at least ten times on the calendar. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked that it should go over in the first place, but I understand that he has not any desire to obstruct it now.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to look into it a little further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; let it go over this morning, but I will venture to make the suggestion that in the near future, unless the bill shall be considered under Rule VIII, I shall feel it my duty to move to take it up. But let it go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

RECLAMATION FUND.

The bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the pending amendment be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment, offered by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], is, on page 3, in the proposed amendment of the committee, line 13, before the word "projects," to strike out the word "feasible;" after the word "projects" to insert "and portions of such projects;" and after the word "Interior," in line 14, to strike out the remainder of the paragraph, so that if amended that portion of the amendment will read:

That the money borrowed under the authority of this act shall be expended in the completion of such projects and portions of such projects as have been heretofore approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARTER. I now offer a substitute for the bill, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete government reclamation projects heretofore begun the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, to transfer from time to time to the credit of the reclamation fund created by the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, such sum or sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000,000, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary to complete the said reclamation projects and such extensions thereof as he may deem proper and necessary to the successful and profitable operation and maintenance thereof or to protect water rights claimed by the United States; and such sum or sums as may be required to comply with the foregoing authority are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the sums hereby authorized to be transferred to the reclamation fund shall be so transferred only as such sums shall be actually needed to meet payments for work performed under existing law.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of providing the Treasury with funds for such advances to the reclamation fund the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $50 or multiples of that sum; said certificates to be redeemable at the option of the United States at any time after three years from the date of their issue and to be payable five years after such date and to bear interest, payable semiannually, at not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, the principal and interest to be payable in gold coin of the United States. The certificates of indebtedness herein authorized may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, giving all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commission shall be allowed and the aggregate issue of such certificates shall not exceed the amount of all advances made to said reclamation fund, and in no event shall the same exceed the sum of $30,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall be exempt from taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under state, municipal, or local authority; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the certificates of indebtedness issued under this act is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 3. That, beginning five years after the date of the first advance to the reclamation fund under this act, 50 per cent of the annual receipts of the reclamation fund shall be paid into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States until payment so made shall equal the aggregate amount of advances made by the Treasury to said reclamation fund, together with interest paid on the certificates of indebtedness issued under this act and any expense incident to preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 4. That all money placed to the credit of the reclamation fund in pursuance of this act shall be devoted exclusively to the completion of work on reclamation projects heretofore begun, as hereinbefore provided, and the same shall be included with all other expenses in future estimates of construction, operation, or maintenance; and hereafter no irrigation project contemplated by said act of June 17, 1902, shall be begun unless and until the same shall have been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and approved by the direct order of the President of the United States.

And further amend by changing the title so as to read:

A bill to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Montana offer this as a substitute for the original bill?

Mr. CARTER. It is offered as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think we ought to be called upon to consider the substitute now, when it is first presented and has not been printed, and has not been examined by Senators? Does not the Senator think it best that the matter should go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the substitute does not increase the amount. It changes the form, however, of the obligation. The substitute, as I understand it, was unanimously agreed to in so far as the character of the obligation of the Government is concerned, by the Committee on Finance, and otherwise it is just as the bill was originally reported.

Mr. CLAY. To say the least of it, a measure which carries $30,000,000 ought to be critically examined by each Senator before it is passed upon.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator——

Mr. CLAY. I notice that it incurs an indebtedness of $30,000,000. I will not say now that I am opposed to it, but I want to look into it, to say the least of it. Then, I see we are to issue $100,000,000 of bonds for public buildings, or we are moving in that direction. I had an idea that this was to be a session devoted to reducing the expenditures of the Government. It strikes me that if we are going to incur a bonded indebtedness of $130,000,000 when we have been in session for only three or four months, we have not given any substantial evidence of economy thus far.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this is a mere advance, as the Senator will observe upon examination. I hope the Senator will accede to the present consideration of the measure.

The Senator, I think, was fairly represented in his views upon the Committee on Finance. The matter was very thoroughly considered and approved by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and his colleagues on that committee. It is desirable that the bill be passed without delay, and I hope the Senator will permit its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I could not follow very thoroughly the reading of the substitute. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana whether or not any provision is made in the substitute on the subject of the exemption from taxation of these securities?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that portion of the substitute which relates to exemption from taxation is identical with the text of the bill as originally reported.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Then another inquiry: What becomes of the proposed amendment to the original bill providing, in substance, that money borrowed under the authority of the act shall not be expended except for the completion of feasible projects which had been theretofore approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Utah will observe that that feature of the original bill has been preserved in the first section of the substitute, wherein it is provided that such sum or sums not exceeding what the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary to complete such reclamation projects—that is, projects heretofore begun—"and such extensions thereof as he may deem proper and necessary to the successful and profitable operation and maintenance thereof."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is that language found in the substitute?

Mr. CARTER. It is found in the substitute.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana whether the amendment which is proposed as a substitute has been printed?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment has not been printed, I will state to the Senator. I have no objection to the matter going over if Senators desire to see the substitute in print. However, I will state to the Senator that the substitute was unanimously approved by the Committee on Finance; that it was approved by the Committee on Irrigation; and that it was checked and corrected according to the Treasury rules and regulations by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The substitute does not depart in essence from the original bill, which has been under consideration for some time, but merely makes a change in the form of the obligation. It divides all relations between the reclamation fund and the purchaser of these certificates. The purchaser of the certificates will look to the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States will, in turn, look to the reclamation fund to reimburse the Treasury.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should say that is a very serious proposition, and one to which I shall undoubtedly be opposed—making the Government primarily liable in that matter. At any rate, a matter which involves $30,000,000 certainly ought not to be passed upon until it has been put in print, so that we may read it and see what it means.

Mr. CARTER. I ask, then, in view of the request of the Senator from Georgia, that the bill go over, and that the substitute be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over, and the substitute will be printed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 6058) amending section 2 of an act entitled "An act to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war," approved April 19, 1908, was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 2430) for the relief of the heirs of John W. West, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 5715) providing for the establishment of building lines and special building restrictions in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

SPECIAL ELECTION IN HAWAII.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) providing for a special election in the Territory of Hawaii was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment at the conclusion of the joint resolution. As I did not apprehend the resolution would come up this morning, I shall simply have to repeat to the Secretary the amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, the chairman of the committee not being in the Chamber, if the Senator proposes to offer an amendment I will ask that the joint resolution go over, if that would suit the convenience of the Senator.

Mr. GORE. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

HOMESTEAD PATENTS WITHIN RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The bill (S. 5048) providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects shall receive patent upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That from and after the filing with the Commissioner of the General Land Office of satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for the five years required by law, persons who have, or shall make, homestead entries within reclamation projects under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, may assign such entries to other persons, and such assignees, upon submitting proof of the reclamation of the lands and upon payment of the charges apportioned against the same, as provided in the said act of June 17, 1902, may receive from the United States a patent for the lands: Provided, That all assignments made under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to make an observation to the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands who reported this bill. I am in rather a peculiar position, I will say to the Senate and to the chairman of the committee. The amendment, as the committee has reported it, grants some relief to these settlers, but it does not grant the relief which the settlers want; and, as it seems to me, the relief which the settlers ought to have. The bill, as I introduced it, provided for the giving of patents to settlers in the regions that come under the reclamation act after they had complied with all the other homestead laws. As Senators have had called to their attention by the discussion which has been had on the bill with reference to the issue of bonds for the completion of irrigation projects, the settlers have gone upon these lands and they have lived there the required time to get their patents, as required by the homestead laws. But the Government has failed to supply them with the water. Accordingly, the settler has no opportunity to pay up and get his patent; he can not make a living on the land without water; and he can not leave without his patent. These settlers are in an absolutely helpless condition as the matter now stands. They have lived there five years and have spent all the money, in many instances, that they could get together to go there and make these homestead entries and the necessary improvements. They are not able to raise anything on the lands, and they can not get their patents, so that they can go away and leave the lands. They either have to stay there, if they hold the lands, or leave there and lose all the money that they have paid out in their improvements. The bill which I introduced provided that they should have a patent upon the theory that the Government has not complied with its part of the agreement to furnish water that it made with the homestead settlers when it threw these irrigation lands open to settlement and invited the settlers there, and that the Government having failed in that particular it ought to issue patents to these settlers.

The committee has proposed an amendment which, as I say, does improve the condition of the settler, but it only gives him the right to assign his interests. There are other important questions involved to these localities in addition to the individual settlers' troubles.

So long as the patent is not issued the land can not be taxed. This may throw the burden of taxation upon a very small per cent of the land. In one particular place that was called to my attention, in a whole township of 36 sections there is only one section that is subject to taxation for the maintenance of roads and schools and for other county expenses. Again, so long as they do not have a patent the settlers are afraid to leave their lands lest somebody else might jump the claim. In short, the settlers individually are suffering and the community in general is handicapped by this delay and through no fault of their own. Those are good people who have gone there to make homes under terms and provisions that the Government prescribed. They have complied with their part, and it seems to me that the Government, having failed on its part, that very liberal treatment should be accorded to the settler to enable him to hold his land and to save the vast expenditure he has made.

I should like to have this committee amendment disagreed to and the bill passed as I introduced it. I know it is an unusual request, but I make it in view of this unusual condition that presents itself. I hope that this amendment will be disagreed to and that the bill as originally introduced will be passed.

I want to ask the attention of the Senator from Montana to the merits of the matter and the equities both to the settler and to the community. Especially do I want him to consider the question of taxation and the right of the settler to leave his land before he gets a patent, as well as the right of the assignee of these entries to live apart from the land until such time as the water shall be supplied to these projects. These are questions of great importance, and I hope the chairman of the committee will consider them before he asks the Senate to adopt the committee amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURKETT. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the question occurs to me in relation to these assignments, as to whether or not the language of the proposed statute sufficiently protects against possible abuse in the bunching together of this land by one assignee getting several tracts?

Mr. BURKETT. Well, of course, whenever a settler gets a patent, anybody can bunch the lands who can buy them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is before patent.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is there to prevent some person who wants to get large areas from taking assignments of 15, 20, 30, or more of these claims—as many as he can get?

Mr. BURKETT. Under the original irrigation act, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota, I think that would be protected against. However, in any event, I recognize the possibility of that if it were permissible under the original irrigation act. But these people have lived there five years, and I take the position that they are entitled to have their patent, which will give them the right to sell to anybody to whom they may desire, but my bill provided that they should have a patent, instead of simply a right to assign to somebody else. I do not want to leave it so that practically the only avenue of escape these settlers have is to assign their rights. I want them to get their title and be the actual owner of the land, and then if they want to and have to they can go somewhere else and make a living until the water comes, and know that they can go back and take possession of their own.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I asked some questions of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, who reported it, and would like to have some explanation of the matter.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the bill as originally presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] provided for the issuance of patents to settlers within the limits of reclamation projects who had merely complied with the terms of the homestead act. That act entitles a person to patent upon proof of five years' residence and such improvements as indicate good faith. Within the reclamation projects, however, in addition to the obligations of the homestead contract, comes in the obligation created by the reclamation act approved in June, 1902, which obligates the settler not only to live upon the land and to comply with the homestead law, but likewise to pay the annual charges for the maintenance of the irrigation work plus installments paid annually for ten years, to embrace in the aggregate the total cost of reclaiming the land embraced within the entry. If a patent issues at the expiration of five years, one contract will have been concluded; the Government will have parted with the fee-simple title and still have another contract outstanding with reference to that land with the original entryman, but not with his grantee. Thus it may come to pass that the grantee of the entryman to whom patent had issued would feel disinclined to execute the portion of the contract relating to the reclamation of the land. In order to protect itself, therefore, the Government must withhold title until the terms of both acts shall have been complied with. Title will not pass under the reclamation act and the homestead act combined until the individual claiming the land as an original entryman, or as the assignee of an entryman, as provided in this bill, has paid the Government the full cost of reclaiming the area embraced in the entry.

The department concluded, and so advised the committee, that the rights of the Government would be jeopardized in the matter of collecting back the cost of reclamation if patent should issue before the final payment had been made, and the committee agreed with that view.

This bill does give some relief to the settlers who have been unfortunately detained upon their lands awaiting the delivery of water by the Government through the government canals. It permits them to assign the entry after they have made proof in compliance with the homestead law; and I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that, in my opinion, a final receipt would issue upon the submission of proof of compliance with the homestead act, but the patent would not issue. Upon the issuance of that final receipt, the land will become subject to taxation. It has been the practice throughout all the western country to tax land when the final receipt has been issued by the Government. That receipt ordinarily takes the place of a patent; and, in the absence of fraud, it is the equivalent of a patent, but it does not constitute a complete title. It is only a high form of evidence of right to the title complete. So that the permission to submit final proof and obtain the final receipt and then to assign the right thereby acquired to another will permit the homesteader who is unable for any cause to wait longer to sell his improvements and his rights, true, short of a complete title, but he has not made complete payment, and has therefore not become entitled to the patent from the United States.

The committee felt that it could go no further without invading the rights of the Government, as viewed by the department and as regarded by the committee itself. I believe the measure will prove in its present form highly beneficial to the people who are situated in such position as to be required to take advantage of its terms.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the bill now subject to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The pending amendment is still amendable.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, the amendment needs one amendment before it shall be adopted.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is in order.

Mr. BORAH. After the word "entries," on page 2, line 8, I move to insert the words "or any part thereof."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the proposed amendment of the committee, line 8, after the word "entries," it is proposed to insert "or any part thereof."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that that phraseology should be somewhat different in order to carry out the idea. The entry is not land; it is a proceeding. I presume the better form would be to provide that the settler might assign any part of the land embraced in the entry.

Mr. BORAH. I take it, Mr. President, that this language would cover that which we seek to do, for the reason that "entry" here is used synonymously with land, and all that the homesteader has to assign is his entry. He can not transfer any land; he can only assign the entry right, which entitles him, upon doing certain things, to secure the land. I will be glad, however, if the Senator thinks that the language should be different, in order to be sure to cover the subject, to accept his suggestion; but it seems to me that the amendment I have suggested will cover it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, the subject which is covered by this bill has been one of more than ordinary interest to the settlers upon the western lands. It has been a matter of agitation as to whether or not they could secure patent before they made their final water payment. A great many have felt that patents under certain circumstances, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT], ought to be issued, but upon the other hand it was apparent that the Government had rights there which it could not give over to the settler without some means of protecting the Government in its deferred water payments. It has been pretty well determined from investigation of the situation and from inquiry from the department that we can not secure here the passage of a bill which would provide for the issuance of patents, and, as has been suggested by the chairman of the committee, the committee have been compelled, therefore, to report such bill as could secure the approval of Congress. While it does not offer all the relief that should be offered, it is a step in advance of what we now have. I myself should have preferred to have seen a law passed which would enable them to secure absolute title, the Government taking some security for its deferred payment, but that being impracticable, and in one sense impossible, from a parliamentary situation, the committee adopted this course, which seems to be the only one open for successful action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute as it has been amended.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, before the amendment of the committee is voted on I move to amend, on page 2, line 3, at the beginning of the line, by inserting the word "the" before the words "General Land Office."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in the proposed substitute of the committee, in line 3, before the words "General Land Office," it is proposed to insert the article "the."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it, the ayes have it, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act."

TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

The bill (S. 9) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "section," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty-two hundred and eighty-nine."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if this amendment is not an inadvertence? The amendment recites "that section 2289 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,'" shall be amended. I think there should be some change in that wording. "Section 2289" must refer to a section in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that was the original title of that act. I would have to examine to ascertain. It was examined at the time, and I think it will be found that that provision is in the act relative to the timber-culture laws.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The provision is in the act, but as reported from the committee by the Senator the amendment provides "that section 2289 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,'" shall be amended, and so forth. I do not think there are 2,289 sections in the act to repeal the timber-culture laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should have to look at the act to see.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I call the Senator's attention to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Without referring to the act, I would not be able to say.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think undoubtedly section 5 of the timber-culture act is the section sought to be amended, which probably is identical with section 2289 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not before me the bill containing the committee amendments as adopted in committee, and it may be that in transcribing them the direction of the committee has not been entirely carried out.

Mr. President, let the bill go over, retaining its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

C. A. WEED—A. P. H. STEWART.

The bill (S. 2441) for the relief of the next of kin of Stewart & Co., and the heirs of C. A. Weed, for whom A. P. H. Stewart was agent, was announced as the next business in order, and was read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the bill may go over. It involves a question which, if the bill is passed, will establish a precedent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota requested that the bill go over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota what is his objection to the bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It proposes to disregard the question of limitation, and therefore, of course, will be a precedent which we will be asked to follow in a great many other cases. I think it is a serious matter. It was considered in the committee at some time when I was not present. I should like to have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I could not hear the latter part of the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota, but I get the idea that he thinks the bill disregards the statute of limitations. Would the Senator be willing to bear with me for a moment in order that I may request that the report be read?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It explains the situation very succinctly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. STEPHENSON on the 24th ultimo, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2411) for the relief of the next of kin of Stewart & Co. and the heirs of C. A. Weed, for whom A. P. H. Stewart was agent, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back with the recommendation that it be amended, and, as so amended, that it do pass.

The amendment which your committee recommended is as follows:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"'That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen, consider, and adjust, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, the claims of Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, for internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been illegally collected between September and November, 1865, on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimants and which taxes have not heretofore been refunded; and if it shall appear that said taxes were illegally collected, then, and in that event, there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, by way of refund, an amount not exceeding $11,208.04, said sum to be paid to the next of kin of C. A. Weed and to the legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart, formerly copartners, trading under the firm name of Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent; which sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of said parties for internal-revenue taxes illegally collected on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimants during the period aforesaid and not heretofore refunded.'"

The bill is recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and is aimed to refund taxes erroneously collected on cotton in 1865, said cotton having been purchased by the claimants from the Government, whereas the statute, section 177, act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 223), provided that "all cotton sold by or on account of the Government of the United States shall be free and exempt from duty at the time of and after the sale thereof."

Favorable reports have been made on the bill in the Senate in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses and by the House in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, and a bill passed the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress. A similar bill was also favorably reported in the Sixtieth Congress, passed the Senate, and was favorably reported in the House.

On June 24, 1909, Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue Caleb Williams reported on this bill to the Hon. HENRY E. BURNHAM, chairman of the Committee on Claims. In said report Mr. Williams invited attention to the report of February 4, 1896, of then Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue G. W. Wilson on the two claims embraced in this bill, and the following is an extract from said report:

"The facts in each of the cases are as follows, viz:

"First. As to the claim for $3,486.64, filed in this office July 9, 1894, the evidence tends to show that Messrs. Stewart & Co. were dealers in cotton in Mobile, Ala., and in the course of business as such dealers purchased 383 bales of cotton, weighing 174,332 pounds, which had been captured by the United States and was sold to them on account of the Government, and that, notwithstanding the fact that the statute, section 177, of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 223), provided that all cotton sold by or on behalf of the Government 'shall be free and exempt from duty,' Mr. Stewart was required to pay and did pay to the United States a tax thereon of 2 cents per pound, amounting to $3,486.64.

"Second. As to the claim for $7,721.40, filed March 7, 1893, the records of this office show that A. P. H. Stewart, agent, paid, from September 13 to 25, 1865, both days inclusive, a tax of 2 cents per pound on 402,156 pounds of cotton, amounting to $8,043.12, 4 per cent of which, $321.72, has been refunded as having been paid on tare of cotton. Mr. Stewart alleges that the whole of this 402,156 pounds was government cotton. If this is a fact, no tax should have been collected on it, it being exempt under section 177, act of June 30, 1864, above referred to.

"Had these claims been presented prior to June 7, 1873, they could have been considered in this office without further legislation. It is understood that this delay in presenting the claims was due to the fact that the claimant supposed that a letter written by his attorney to this office in July, 1871, was sufficient to save the bar, and to the further fact that he relied for evidence in support of the first-named claim on the case of The United States v. Harrison Johnson, decided by the United States Supreme Court at its October term, 1887.

"I feel disposed to say that the circumstances connected with the first two claims embraced in the bill appear to have been such as to render it proper that the claimants, Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, should be relieved from the operation of the statute of limitation and allowed to prosecute the claims as if they had been filed in time.

"To the extent that they were required to pay taxes contrary to the provision of law, above mentioned, they should undoubtedly have relief."

The first two claims above mentioned are the only ones embraced in the bill.

In view of the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that "to the extent that" the claimants "were required to pay taxes contrary to the provision of law, above mentioned, they undoubtedly have relief," your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if, upon the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with reference to the merits of this case, and the fact that the money was collected illegally by the Government and has been withheld from the claimants, he is not willing to have the bill put upon its passage?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was the finding made by the Court of Claims?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand, it is to be adjusted in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It gives him the authority? I have no objection to the bill as such. It was the question of throwing down the bar and its effect generally that led me to ask that it go over. But in view of the expressions of the department I will withdraw my objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen, consider, and adjust, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, the claims of Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, for internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been illegally collected between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866, on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimant and which taxes have not heretofore been refunded; and if it shall appear that said taxes were illegally collected, then and in that event there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, by way of refund, an amount not exceeding $11,208.04, said sum to be paid to the next of kin of C. A. Weed and to the legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart, formerly copartners, trading under the firm names of Stewart & Co., and A. P. H. Stewart, agent; which sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of said parties for internal-revenue taxes illegally collected on cotton purchased from the Government by the claimants during the period aforesaid and not heretofore refunded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Utah suggested when this bill was heretofore considered that the title should be amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the title should be amended.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the next of kin of C. A. Weed and the legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart."

TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to recur to the bill (S. 9) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891. I find that the discrepancy in the print arose from the fact that an uncorrected copy of the bill was evidently sent to the printer. The committee agreed upon certain amendments, and I will state them, so that they may be made.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state the amendments as they were agreed upon in the committee: In line 4, after the word "the," insert the words "Revised Statutes;" then strike out the balance of line 4 down to and including the bracket in line 7; then, in line 7, after the word "amended," strike out "in the third paragraph of said section." That was the agreement of the committee, and the marked copy evidently got confused with one that was not marked.

Mr. KEAN. But that does not remedy the difficulty.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will read then:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2289 of the Revised Statutes be amended.

That is what we are amending.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is it not the supplement to the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I have it before me. I have compared the language.

Section 2289 of the Revised Statutes is the first paragraph of the homestead law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the section we are proposing to amend.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The act of 1862.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee recommends certain amendments, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, strike out the word "five" and insert "twenty-two hundred and eighty-nine;" after the words "of the" in line 4 insert "Revised Statutes;" in line 4, beginning with the word "Act," strike out all of the bill down to and including the bracket after the word "forty-two" in line 7; in line 7 strike out the words "in the third paragraph of said section;" on page 2, line 1, strike out the word "paragraph" and insert "section;" so as to read:

That section 2289 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the word "proprietor" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "owner in fee," so that the section shall read, when amended, as follows:

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEYBURN, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2289 of the Revised Statutes."

RESURVEYS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116) to amend an act to correct chapter 271 of volume 35, United States Statutes at Large, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. When this order was before the Senate it was suggested that certain information could, and as I understood would, be procured in regard to the records in this matter. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] whether he has any further information than that stated upon the former occasion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand the only information possible to be obtained along the line of my remarks is the conference report, which will show the fact as I stated it. Of course, I have not brought to my desk the conference report.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it not be well, when we take up this matter again, to have the conference report and the enrolled bill before us, and then we could ascertain whether the mistake was made in the conference report? I understood the Senator to say he was not a member of the conference committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; the Senator from Idaho misunderstood me. The Senator from Wyoming said he could not recall whether he had or had not been a member of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the Senator consulted the RECORD?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I have not. I am perfectly willing to have the joint resolution go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will realize the importance of it. It is a difference of some $40,000 as to which fund it goes into.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not necessarily; but I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over at the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

COURT OF COMMERCE.

The bill (S. 6737) to create a court of commerce and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. I should be very glad to have the bill passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

MARGARETHA WEIDEMAN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 6639) for the relief of Margaretha Weideman, Clarence C. Weideman, and Auguerite E. Weideman, owners of lots Nos. 1, 2, and 3, square No. 434, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as the next business in order on the calendar, and was read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator who reported the bill is not in the Chamber, and I suggest that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 6738) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension the persons named at the rates stated:

Harry E. Wagner, late of Company A, Twentieth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Charles J. Snyder, late of Company D, Fifteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

William Mickler, late of Captain Moseley's independent company, Florida Mounted Volunteers, Seminole Indian war, $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 6739) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension the persons named at the rates stated:

James K. Watts, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Edward Woodring, late of Company D, One hundredth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

German L. Hunt, late of Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

James H. Dickson, late of Company C, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment Ohio National Guard Infantry, $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Monroe Masterson, late of Company F, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Young S. Slater, late of Company D, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Heavy Artillery, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

John B. Lydick, late second lieutenant Company C, Twelfth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

William S. Smith, late of Company E, Thirty-fifth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Alfred Evans, late of Company B, Forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Henry W. Crow, late of Company C, Ninety-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Wilbert B. Teters, late captain Company H and lieutenant-colonel One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

William McKenney, late of Company G, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 2925) to increase the limit of cost for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, and improvement of the federal building at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with an amendment in line 8 to strike out all of the bill after the word "dollars," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost fixed by the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, and improvement of the federal building at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., be, and the same is hereby, extended from $100,000 to $190,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 1) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Let the bill go over. It involves $10,000,000.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives returning to the Senate in compliance with its request the bill (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to an amendment striking out lines 10 to 13, inclusive, on page 5.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let the question be put on the amendment, which I trust will be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out lines 10 to 13, inclusive, as follows:

The name of Hannah Kelley, dependent mother of John D. Kelley, late of Company L, Eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out all of lines 22 to 25, inclusive, on page 5.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out lines 22 to 25, inclusive, as follows:

The name of Mary Ryan, dependent mother of Peter Ryan, late of Company I, Second Regiment United States Infantry, war with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator state the reason for the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will. In preparing the bill one of the committee clerks made an error and struck out the wrong paragraph, contrary to what was the direction of the Committee on Pensions. The bill passed without our observing that that paragraph had been stricken out and the one we intended to have stricken out left in. I had the bill recalled for that purpose, and these amendments correct the error.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POCATELLO, IDAHO.

The bill (S. 5920) providing for the erection of a public building at Pocatello, in the State of Idaho, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected on the site heretofore purchased by the United States a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, United States court, and United States Weather Bureau at the city of Pocatello, in the State of Idaho, which said building, with its appurtenances, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in the aggregate $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BURLINGTON, N. C.

The bill (S. 1829) for the erection of a public building at Burlington, N. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate not to exceed $75,000 to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, approaches, and other necessary appurtenances for the use and accommodation of the United States as a post-office at Burlington, N. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PORTLAND, OREG.

The bill (S. 2484) to provide for the purchase of a site and for the erection of a public building thereon at Portland, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 10, before the word "million," to strike out "two" and insert "one," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of Portland, State of Oregon, the cost of same not to exceed the sum of $1,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The bill (S. 533) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate not to exceed $150,000 to cause to be erected on a site already purchased by the Government a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States appraisers' stores in the city of Milwaukee and State of Wisconsin.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARETHA WEIDEMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. In my absence the bill (S. 6639) for the relief of Margaretha Weideman, Clarence C. Weideman, and Auguerite E. Weideman, owners of lots numbered 1, 2, and 3, square numbered 434, in the city of Washington, D. C., was passed over. It is a bill to which there is no objection. I ask that it be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CARTERSVILLE, GA.

The bill (S. 6032) to provide for the erection of a public building at Cartersville, Ga., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after the word "to," to strike out the words "acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and;" in line 5, after the word "erected," to strike out the word "thereon" and to insert "upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Cartersville, Ga.;" in line 8, after the word "elevators," to insert "approaches;" and on page 2, line 1, before the word "building," to strike out the words "site and," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Cartersville, Ga., a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, elevators, approaches, and heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, in the city of Cartersville, Ga., the cost of said building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed $50,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT COLLINS, COLO.

The bill (S. 4703) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office at Fort Collins, Colo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office at Fort Collins, Colo., be, and the same hereby is, increased from the sum of $60,000 to the sum of $135,000, said increase to be employed in the enlargement and betterment of the building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF FIRE-INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The bill (S. 3806) to reimburse certain fire-insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

RED LAKE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (S. 5785) to amend an act entitled "An act to allow the Minneapolis, Red Lake and Manitoba Railway Company to acquire certain lands in the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.," approved February 8, 1905, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act referred to by adding at the end thereof a section reading as follows:

SEC. 7. After said company shall have filed maps of definite location and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, as provided in section 3, and compensation shall have been made to the tribes of Indians and occupants, as provided in section 2, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a patent for the land selected and taken to be issued to said company, the same to be in proper form to show the title vested in the company to the land selected by the terms of the grant in this act contained.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report.

Mr. SHIVELY. I should like to have it read.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the only question involved here is that ordinarily and previous to this the department has held that the filing of maps of location and acceptance constitute the title. I think the company very properly prefers that a patent shall issue, the report of the department setting forth those facts. There is no objection to the bill. The only possible change is that after they have made the compensation, instead of the title merely resting on the acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of the maps filed, a patent shall issue to the company for the right of way.

Mr. SHIVELY. I withdraw my request for the reading of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE INDIAN AGENCY.

The bill (S. 5786) to amend fifth paragraph of section 4 of act approved June 28, 1906 (34 Stat., 539), was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "paragraph," to strike out "fifth" and insert "fourth," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth paragraph of section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1906 (34 Stat., 539), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "not to exceed $30,000 per annum" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not to exceed $50,000 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator from Minnesota explain the purpose of this proposed legislation?

Mr. KEAN. I was going to ask that the report be printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill. I think the report explains it very fully.

Mr. CLAPP. The bill is here at the request of the department, that they may have $50,000 instead of $30,000 out of the fund for the Osages to administer the affairs of the tribe at the agency. I can have the report read if the Senator desires.

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand that $30,000 under the present statute is a lump sum to be used at the discretion of the department?

Mr. CLAPP. It is to be used by the department at that agency, and they found it was not enough. It has to be partly paid out for the expenses of the agency and partly as an emergency fund on account of sickness, and so forth. The bill is recommended by the department.

Mr. SHIVELY. It does not increase the appropriation, but merely diverts more of the funds for this purpose.

Mr. CLAPP. It is all taken out of the Indian fund. It is the Indian fund that we are administering.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 295, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

AMENDING ACT RELATING TO OSAGE INDIAN AGENCY.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 5786:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill 5786, having examined the same, make favorable report and recommend that the same do pass, with certain amendments.

In support of the bill letter of the Secretary of the Interior of date January 25, 1910, is attached.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 25, 1910.

SIR: By direction of the President, I have the honor to invite your attention to the need of additional assistants for field and office service at the Osage Indian Agency.

The act of Congress approved June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 539), provides that all funds of the Osage tribe and all money due or becoming due shall be held in trust by the United States for the period of twenty-five years from and after January 1, 1907. It further provides that the royalty received from oil, gas, coal, and other mineral leases, money received from the sale of town lots, and all money received from grazing lands "shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of members of the Osage tribe of Indians as other moneys of said tribe are to be deposited under the provisions of this act, and the same shall be distributed to the individual members of said Osage tribe according to the rule provided for herein, in the same manner and at the same time that payments are made of interest on other moneys held in trust for the Osages by the United States, except as herein provided."

The exceptions are (a) the provision that there shall be set aside from the royalties received from the oil and gas a sum not exceeding $50,000 per annum for ten years for the support of certain schools; (b) the provision that there shall be set aside from the royalties received from oil, gas, coal, and other mineral leases money received from the sale of town lots and rents from grazing lands, "not to exceed $30,000 per annum, for agency purposes and emergency fund for the Osage tribe, which shall be paid out from time to time upon the requisition of the Osage tribal council, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

It will therefore be seen that by the terms of the act of June 28, 1906, the sum of $30,000 per annum is allowed for salaries and as an emergency fund to be expended by the Osage tribal council. There has been paid out of this sum the compensation of the tribal attorneys, Messrs. Kappler & Merillat, amounting to about $6,000 per annum, and about $2,800 per annum for salaries of the tribal council, leaving $21,200 for the conduct and management of the business affairs of the Osage Reservation, which contains approximately 1,500,000 acres of valuable land.

The inadequacy of the present force for administering the affairs of the agency has long been apparent, and can best be appreciated when it is understood that the superintendent of the agency is handling an office where the collections and disbursements will approximate $2,400,000 annually. These funds must be accounted for and paid out annually at a cost of about $21,000, or a basis of seven-eighths of 1 per cent.

There is transmitted herewith a proposed amendment to the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 539), increasing the allowance which may be spent from the royalties received from oil, gas, coal, and other mineral leases, money received from the sale of town lots, and rents from grazing lands from $30,000 to $50,000 per annum. A considerable number of clerks are required at the present time to bring the work of the agency to date, and on account of large oil and gas operations on the Osage lands it is estimated that there will be required permanently, in addition to the present force, about six additional clerks and six field men. The compensation of these employees, in addition to the incidental expenses which will be required in the administration of the affairs of this agency, will, it is estimated, require about $20,000 per annum, the sum provided for in the amendment to the bill.

I have the honor to request that you will cause this bill to be introduced in the Senate, and that it be given the favorable consideration of your committee.

Very respectfully, R. A. BALLINGER, Secretary.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have the bill go over, if it is not too late.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over on the objection of the Senator from Oklahoma.

COURT OF PATENT APPEALS.

The bill (S. 4982) to establish a United States court of patent appeals, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TRENTON, MO.

The bill (S. 2209) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Trenton, in the State of Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out the words "acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site;" in line 5, to strike out the word "thereon" and insert "upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Trenton, in the State of Missouri;" in line 11, before the word "building," to strike out the words "site and;" and on page 2, beginning with line 4, to strike out the remainder of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Trenton, in the State of Missouri, a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of governmental offices in the city of Trenton and State of Missouri, the cost of said building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $75,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the erection of a public building at Trenton, in the State of Missouri."

RECLAMATION FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was understood that this bill should go over when it was reached as unfinished business. Without objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Idaho to allow the next bill on the calendar to be disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield after the question is put.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT PRACTICE IN WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The next bill on the calendar is the one to which I had reference. It is the bill (H. R. 18019) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas." The bill went over yesterday on the objection of the Senator from Idaho. He said that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws had proceeded so far with the preparation of matters which they would subsequently present to the Senate, and this covered the same subject-matter. I thought we should afford him any opportunity he wants, and if he proposed he could get it, whether we afford it or not, to advise himself as to the particular provisions of this bill. Some time must elapse before the report of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws can be adopted. In the meantime this bill ought to be operative. It simply provides for paying the costs in certain cases accidentally omitted in a special act that applies to the western district of Arkansas.

Mr. HALE. All right; we will pass the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was read yesterday.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. Are there any executive communications on the desk?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are none.

Mr. HALE. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 2, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 1, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, February 28, 1910.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg respectfully to hereby resign from the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

I am, very truly, yours, W. G. BRANTLEY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Georgia will be relieved from service on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following committee appointment:

Representative S. A. RODDENBERY, of Georgia, a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 10321) for the relief of the homestead settlers under the act of February 20, 1904, to correct an error, the bill having been printed differently from the way it was reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. A publication called the "American Flag," purporting to be issued in Cleveland, Ohio, and bearing date December 1, 1909, has been sent, as I am reliably informed, to every Senator and Member of the House and has been very extensively circulated in my own district. It attacks me in my official capacity as a Representative. It affects my reputation and my right and conduct as a Member of the House of Representatives. It charges me with various wrongs as a Representative, among others that while the question of the ship-subsidy bill was before the House I voted in the interest of foreigners; that I attended the meetings of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that, apparently, I did not know what happened in the committee. I simply mention these things because I want to show that it comes directly within Rule IX of the Rules of the House of Representatives. In order that the matter may be fully before the House, I will ask the Clerk to read part of the article which is relevant, and which I have marked, and which is headed "Congressman STEENERSON, of Minnesota—Does he represent the foreign shipping interests or his own district?"

The Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESSMAN STEENERSON, OF MINNESOTA—DOES HE REPRESENT THE FOREIGN SHIPPING INTERESTS OR HIS OWN DISTRICT?

HALVOR STEENERSON, of Crookston, Minn., has been a Representative in Congress from the ninth district of that State for six years and has now entered on his fourth term. Throughout his first three terms he was a member of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which are referred bills relating to mail pay for ocean service.

It justly may be inferred because of Mr. STEENERSON'S previous experience as an attorney, his length of service as a public servant and his unusual and almost perfect facilities to get at the truth of most public questions, if he wished to do so, that, should he indulge in gross misrepresentations relating to a public matter with which he is, or ought to be, thoroughly familiar, that he does so with malice and aforethought and with full realization of his responsibility.

LEAGUE MAKES A STATEMENT ABOUT CONGRESSMAN STEENERSON.

On June 6, 1909, the Merchant Marine League received a letter from Mr. E. A. Force, of the firm of Wilson & Force, Minneapolis, Minn., representative of the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, of Baltimore, Md., in which Mr. Force expressed strong interest in the matter of the restoration of our merchant marine and asked for further information and literature. We fully explained the situation and made a statement to the effect that Congressman STEENERSON was the only one from his State to oppose merchant-marine legislation.

MR. STEENERSON IS HEARD FROM.

Mr. Force sent a copy of our letter to Mr. STEENERSON and received the following reply from Mr. STEENERSON dated July 7:

"I have yours of the 2d instant stating that you are considerably interested in the work undertaken by the Merchant Marine League of the United States and inclosing a letter from that concern criticising my opposition to the so-called 'subsidy proposition.' In reply I have to say that I have consistently opposed the legislation in question in several Congresses and the reasons were both privately and publicly expressed. I have ordered sent you a copy of my remarks on the last subsidy proposition which I think will indicate to you that I am not opposed to the upbuilding of our merchant marine in the foreign trade, but I am anxious to see it properly encouraged. I am in hopes that some proposition will be worked out that will be an improvement on the former one, for certainly, according to my best judgment, the bill referred to, which was defeated in the last Congress, was a vicious bill and would never have accomplished what was claimed for it. Of course, you understand that the Merchant Marine League is an organization of interested parties who expect to get big contracts and make money at shipbuilding and other enterprises stimulated by the proposed subsidy and that their patriotism and love for the flag is largely, if not wholly, due to the appropriations involved.

"Are you aware of the fact that under the existing law, and as it would have been if the late subsidy bill had passed, the proposed ships would not have paid American wages to American seamen as they pretend to be desirous of doing? Under the existing law our subsidized lines in the foreign trade, including the Pacific Mail and the Hill Line, have the right to employ cooly labor and they avail themselves of that right to the fullest extent and are now, and have been in the past, employing the cheapest kind of labor obtainable. Unless some measure can be passed that will actually encourage American shipping in foreign trade, without at the same time resulting in private gain and graft, I will continue to oppose subsidies of this kind, although, as I have said, I should like to see the end pretended to be achieved accomplished."

The Merchant Marine League was organized in 1904, and during its five years of active propaganda the league is frank to admit that never before has there been brought to its attention a letter signed by a Congressman that contains so many actual misstatements and apparently so much deliberate perversion of truth as does this one.

WORD "VICIOUS" IS ANALYZED.

Mr. STEENERSON asserts in his letter that the ocean mail bill of the last Congress was a "vicious bill." The bill was framed by members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet and indorsed by him and the entire Cabinet in the most earnest way. It was approved by practically all of the great commercial organizations of the country, including the trans-Mississippi Congress, representing especially the middle and farther West. Mr. Taft advocated it in several public speeches, and though it was bitterly fought by the European steamship combinations that monopolize 90 per cent of our carrying trade and their retained representatives, it was defeated by only three votes. If the bill was "vicious," then Mr. Roosevelt and all the members of his Cabinet, including President Taft, are "vicious."

The ocean-mail bill, which Congressman STEENERSON fought so "viciously" both in the committee of which he was a member and on the House floor when he spoke against it, would not have added a dollar of extra burden to the country, for it contained the following clause:

"And provided further, That the total expenditure of foreign-mail service in any one year shall not exceed the estimated revenue therefrom for that year."

SOURCE OF INCOME EXPLAINED.

For several years the revenue received by the Government from the sale of sea postage has exceeded the cost of having our mails carried largely by foreign vessels. In the year 1908 the Government received an income of $8,585,564.24 from the sale of sea postage and paid for having it carried across the seas $2,875,911.72, leaving a profit of $5,709,662.52. This was the money, proposed by the terms of the bill, to be expended for the establishment of American-built, owned, and manned steamship lines, regular, speedy, and direct, plying between the ports of the United States and the ports of South America, the Philippines, Australasia, and the Orient, with which we now have either inefficient or no steamship communication. Should this bill have been enacted it would have caused the American flag on merchant vessels to be seen in ports where it has been seen rarely, if at all, since the civil war.

The proposed law was agreed to by the Senate without dissent. Its enactment was earnestly sought by the business interests of the country, who saw in the proposed service not only a stimulation of trade of benefit to all kinds of industry but also the formation of the nucleus of an auxiliary naval marine of supreme necessity to the navy in event of war. The enactment of the bill would have been a long step forward toward the revival of our cross-seas marine, which, with but 10 vessels now in the service, is threatened with extinction.

STEENERSON EXULTS AND FOREIGNERS REJOICE.

HALVOR STEENERSON, in opposition to the majority sentiment of his State, stood up in his place in the House of Representatives and to the delight and exultation of the foreign shipowners and ship operators, used the power of his position, of his ability and his voice to fasten on the country more securely than ever the grip by which foreign nations through their subsidized shipping companies largely control the foreign trade of the country and incidentally endeavor to dictate the commercial relations of the United States with the world. To HALVOR STEENERSON may be given some of the honor and the credit of our present humiliating naval position, as evidenced by the cruise of our battle ships around the world, when they were accompanied by 27 colliers flying the flags of foreign nations.

PROVE IT, MR. STEENERSON.

Congressman STEENERSON says further in his letter:

"The Merchant Marine League is an organization by interested parties who expect to get big contracts and make money at shipbuilding and other enterprises, stimulated by the proposed subsidy and that their patriotism and love for the flag is largely, if not wholly, due to the appropriation involved."

The Merchant Marine League and its work, its officers and its membership have been before the public for five years. The names of its officers are printed on its literature. Some of the most eminent men of the Nation have been pleased publicly to acknowledge their connection with the league and openly to approve of its objects. The membership includes manufacturers, professional men, bankers, miners, farmers, railroad men, traders, publicists, and writers and speakers, more than one of national fame. Every State in the Union is represented in this membership. Can HALVOR STEENERSON name one member of the league who hopes "to get big contracts and make money at shipbuilding and other enterprises stimulated by the proposed subsidy?" If so, let him do it; if he can not he should apologize.

NO SHIPBUILDER'S MONEY WANTED.

Again the Merchant Marine League makes the announcement that has been made more than once to this Congressman: Neither the league nor its officers have any pecuniary interest in shipbuilding or ship operation. The league has never accepted a dollar from any person connected with shipbuilding and ship operating. Contributions from these quarters have been offered the league time and time again, but just as often they have been respectfully declined, and the league will continue to decline such contributions if any should be offered in the future. This policy is not dictated by hypocritical pretense, by a desire to throw dust in the eyes of the people, but simply because the league can get along without such contributions. At the very beginning of the league's work, its executive officers decided that the organization must be so conducted as to be in position truthfully to assert at all times that it is free from connection with shipping interests, since such a charge is about the first one to be looked for from the foreign shipping combinations and their representatives in and out of Congress who bitterly resent the activity of the league in demanding such legislation as will restore the American flag to something of the commercial importance and political dignity it once enjoyed on the seas of the world. * * *

EVERYBODY WRONG EXCEPT MR. STEENERSON.

Does this Congressman believe that the strong desire of President Roosevelt and his Cabinet that the ocean mail bill be enacted was "wholly due to the appropriation involved?"

Does HALVOR STEENERSON wish to have it understood that in his opinion the frank and generous indorsement of the bill by President Taft was dictated by some secret, selfish purpose?

Does HALVOR STEENERSON charge that Vice-President SHERMAN, Speaker CANNON, and the 172 Members of Congress who voted for the bill "expect to get big contracts and make money at shipbuilding and other enterprises stimulated by the proposed subsidy?"

* * * * * * *

DOES MR. STEENERSON INDICT CONFRÈRES IN CONGRESS.

Does HALVOR STEENERSON charge that Senators KNUTE NELSON and MOSES EDWIN CLAPP, of Minnesota, voted for the ocean mail bill for an ulterior reason, and that their "love for the flag is largely, if not wholly, due to the appropriation involved?"

Does HALVOR STEENERSON desire to indict his confreres in Congress, Messrs. TAWNEY, DAVIS, STEVENS, NYE, LINDBERGH, VOLSTEAD, and MILLER, all of whom voted for the bill, as dishonest, disloyal men?

Surely, HALVOR STEENERSON, there may be a kind of patriotism quite different from your conception of it. Thank God that in the State of Minnesota there are men of the caliber of NELSON, CLAPP, VAN SANT, TAWNEY, DAVIS, STEVENS, NYE, LINDBERGH, VOLSTEAD, and MILLER who hold a radically different view of the meaning of "loyalty" to their native land!

Then Mr. STEENERSON writes as follows:

"Are you aware that under the existing law, and as it would have been if the late subsidy bill had passed, the proposed ships would not have paid American wages to American seamen, as they pretend to be desirous of doing?"

No, we are not aware of any truth existing in these false statements; neither is Mr. STEENERSON. The bill came through the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which Mr. STEENERSON at that time was a member. The bill was fully discussed in committee. If Mr. STEENERSON attended the meetings, it was impossible that he should not know the truth. If he did attend the meetings and makes the foregoing statement, he has deliberately and maliciously lied. If he did not attend the meetings, and does not know the truth, he should not attempt to write and speak on a matter of which he is ignorant.

MR. STEENERSON IS UNINFORMED OR MALICIOUS.

If Mr. STEENERSON knows anything about the ocean mail bill which he strove to defeat last spring in the House, while the foreign shipping combinations rejoiced, he knows that the ocean mail bill was simply an amendment to a single section of the ocean mail law of March 3, 1891, passed during the administration of President Harrison. The defeated ocean mail bill simply asked for a restoration of the rates strongly urged by Mr. Harrison, the bill providing that the rate to be paid vessels of the first class, as described in the act of 1891, should be paid the vessels of the second class, as described in the act of 1891, and that vessels of the third class, as described in the act of 1891, should draw the pay applicable to vessels of the second class, as described in the same act. Had the ocean mail bill passed, every other clause of the act of 1891 would have remained in full force in the making of any contracts for the carrying of United States mails under the terms of the act.

* * * * * * *

Mr. STEENERSON is again guilty of deliberate and malicious falsification when he says:

"Under the existing law our subsidized lines in the foreign trade, including the Pacific Mail and the Hill Line, have the right to the fullest extent and are now and have been in the past employing the cheapest kind of labor obtainable."

Neither the Pacific Mail nor the Hill Line draws one dollar of subsidy from the United States Government, and Congressman STEENERSON knows it.

The present subsidized lines of the United States are the American Line from New York to Southampton, the Ward and "Red D" lines to various South American and West Indian ports, the Admiral Line to ports of the West Indies and Mexico, and in the Pacific only one small steamer of the Oceanic Line to Tahiti.

LAW REQUIREMENTS ARE RIGID.

These subsidized lines are bound by the requirements of the Harrison ocean-mail law, which, we have shown, carefully and specifically provide the percentage of Americans that shall be employed during the various periods of the contract. While the law does not require that more than one-half of the crew of an American mail subsidized ship shall be American citizens, yet, because of the fact that white men will not work and eat and live with coolies on shipboard, the effect of the law is to prohibit absolutely the employment of such labor except, perhaps, for cooks, stewards, and scullions. The subsidized vessels are expected to pay, and they do pay, the American scale of wages. This fact is clearly established by the following tabular summary giving the actual pay-roll total of three vessels in the Atlantic trade, the St. Louis, American, a typical mail steamer; the Oceanic, British; the German steamer Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse; and the American is the smallest ship of the lot.

* * * * * * *

MR. STEENERSON WORKS FOR COOLIES.

The abandoned American line to Australia, while in operation actually received under the Harrison ocean-mail act less mail pay than either European or Japanese ships performing similar service for their countries. The line was withdrawn two years ago because of the defeat of the ocean-mail bill providing additional compensation. Mr. STEENERSON voted against that bill, the failure of which drove American steamships, manned by American seamen, built by American material and by American workmen, off the Pacific Ocean, thus affording larger employment for the cooly labor of the Orient, and turning over to the control of foreigners all of the commerce we had with Australia, which as a result was completely wiped out. Mr. STEENERSON struck a direct blow at American labor on the seas, in addition to the injury that he did to the cause of labor, when he took away from American manufacturers and American workingmen the profits of the trade that we had built up with Australia.

PACIFIC STEAMERS NOT SUBSIDIZED.

The five Pacific Mail steamships and the one Hill steamship now plying between our Pacific coast and the Orient are officered, as the law requires of all ships, by American sailors, but are manned chiefly by Asiatics, who also man the British and Japanese subsidized lines running in direct competition with them. It would manifestly be impossible for the Pacific Mail and Hill ships, without mail compensation, to employ American seamen at $40 a month, while their British and Japanese rivals not only have the advantage of generous subsidies, but have the added advantage of coolie labor at $8 a month. The Oceanic Line to Australia tried the experiment. It employed white American crews and it had a mail contract under the law of 1891, but in three or four years it had lost a very large sum of money, and when Congress refused to increase its compensation so that it could continue to employ American ships and American crews, the service was abandoned.

When the ocean-mail act of 1891 went first into effect the Pacific Mail took a contract and sought to run under its provisions. After a few voyages the contract was given up, the company declaring that the requirement of regular sailings, increased speed, and the employment of American high-wage crews added to the cost a great deal more than the subsidy amounted to. For many years the Pacific Mail has operated its ships without a mail contract, without aid, with the help of Asiatic labor. Mr. R. P. Schwerin, vice-president and general manager of the company, before the Congressional Merchant-Marine Commission, at San Francisco, in August, 1904, stated that it would cost $436,000 annually to replace with American citizens the Asiatic crews of his five trans-Pacific liners.

BOTH HILL AND HARRIMAN AGAINST SUBSIDIES.

Both the Pacific Mail managers and Mr. Hill have declared publicly and privately year after year that if the ocean mail bills that have been brought up and defeated had been passed, they would not have run their ships under the legislation because of the requirement that they should give up their Asiatic crews. Both the late Mr. Harriman and Mr. Hill openly attacked the proposed legislation time and time again, declaring that they desired to employ Asiatic labor and were not in favor of the subsidy. Mr. STEENERSON ought to know, and probably does know, that this has always been Mr. Hill's position and that Mr. Hill was one of the most active and powerful opponents of the Frye-Hanna subsidy bill of several years ago. Both Mr. Harriman and Mr. Hill repeatedly made it known that if Congress attempted to prevent them from employing Asiatic labor, they would promptly place their vessels under the flag of some foreign government, as has only recently been done with three large unsubsidized American steamships of the International Navigation Company in foreign trade.

INDEPENDENT OPERATORS STAND READY.

But independent shipowners have always shown themselves far more willing to employ Americans in place of Asiatic seamen, if only they were adequately protected and encouraged by their Government. * * *

The five American steamships controlled by independent American shipowners, not by the railroads, were consequently withdrawn, and their business has been taken over by British and Japanese ships manned by Asiatics and worked primarily in the interests of British and Japanese commerce. The practical effect of the defeat of the bill was to turn our mail carrying and cargo carrying in the Pacific more completely than ever over to cooly labor—exactly the thing that would result, as was pointed out by President Roosevelt in a message to Congress.

STEENERSON SOON TO HAVE CHANCE.

If Congressman STEENERSON has any real solicitude for American labor, if he is in truth not throwing dust in the eyes of his constituents by declaiming against cooly labor, then he will soon have an opportunity to show his sincerity. * * *

WHAT MANNER OF MAN IS THIS?

Is a man fit to hold high public office that will deliberately pervert and maliciously falsify the facts connected with any important public question? Is he a safe, a trustworthy man? We hold that he is not; that such a man is dishonest and an enemy to his country and his country's best interests, and that he and men like him are a constant menace to American progress at home and abroad.

There are not many such in Congress, but there will always be found a few, and the ninth district of Minnesota has one.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman yet reached the question of personal privilege?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think some of the questions have been reached; there are four or five different places where my official conduct is reflected upon and my honesty and integrity as a Representative is impugned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there are quite a number of additional pages. The Chair will ask the gentleman to point out the matters of privilege that he wishes to reply to or that the gentleman inform the Chair whether he wishes to have the whole article printed.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it will be necessary, in order to understand the charge made, to read the part of the article that I have marked. I have marked some parts and other parts I have marked out. For instance, there is a table of wages. I have marked that out. Of course I can insert the whole thing in the RECORD, and I will refer to each charge in my remarks, but I think it has already appeared unquestionably that this attacks me in my capacity as a Member of Congress and as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and my official fidelity and honesty is questioned.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think I must raise the point of order against the gentleman, although I dislike very much to do it. I can not find anything in the article as it has been read, except an argument to show that the gentleman was mistaken in his vote.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; they go further.

Mr. PAYNE. And an argument to bolster up those of us who did not agree with him on that vote.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, in the first place, I contend that the letter was written to me asking the reason why I took the position that I did in the House of Representatives, that that was an official letter, and that I answered it, giving my views in my official capacity. It could not relate to anything else but my official duties. Now, they charge that every statement in my letter is false. That affects, within Rule IX, my reputation as a Member of the House of Representatives. They say that I have charged all the Members who disagreed with men with being vicious, and so forth, and that is not justified.

But this article goes further than to question the truth of the statement in my letter. It goes far beyond that and assails my official conduct in the House and in committee. It impugns my motives and questions the honesty of my purposes as a Representative.

Rule IX provides: "Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety and dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members individually in their representative capacity only, and shall have precedence over all other questions except motions to adjourn." The published article comes, I submit, directly within the rule.

They say on page 5:

HALVOR STEENERSON, in opposition to the majority sentiment of his State, stood up in his place in the House of Representatives and to the delight and exultation of the foreign shipowners and ship operators used the power of his position, of his ability, and his voice to fasten on the country more securely than ever the grip by which foreign nations, through their subsidized shipping companies, largely control the foreign trade of the country——

Mr. PAYNE. I submit, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STEENERSON. Wait until I get through. Then on page 6 it says:

Every State in the Union is represented in its membership——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Minnesota suspend? The gentleman stands so far back in the Hall that the Chair is not able to hear him intelligently. Will the gentleman have the kindness to move down the aisle a little bit, as the Chair desires to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. The statement on page 5 is that—

HALVOR STEENERSON, in opposition to the majority sentiment of his State, stood up in his place in the House of Representatives and to the delight and exultation of the foreign shipowners and ship operators used the power of his position, of his ability, and his voice to fasten on the country more securely than ever the grip by which foreign nations through their subsidized shipping companies largely control the foreign trade of the country and incidently endeavor to dictate the commercial relations of the United States with the world.

Now, that charges misconduct as a Representative in being disloyal to our own country. Under Rule IX it says, "anything that affects a man's reputation as a Member." Now, on page 7 there is this statement, after copying from my letter with regard to what ships would have paid in wages:

No, we are not aware of any truth existing in these false statements; neither is Mr. STEENERSON. The bill came through the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which Mr. STEENERSON at that time was a member. The bill was fully discussed in committee. If Mr. STEENERSON attended the meetings, it was impossible that he should not know the truth. If he did attend the meetings and makes the foregoing statement, he has deliberately and maliciously lied.

Now, that reflects upon me as a Member of the House in my official capacity. There are four or five other places that——

Mr. PAYNE. Is not this all directed against the letter which you wrote?

Mr. STEENERSON. No.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not founded upon a statement in the letter to a private party?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. The letter, I contend, was written in my capacity as a Congressman, but the criticism on the letter goes on and refers to what I did while in the committee and on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there anything further?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I will read all these.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair means upon which the gentleman rests his question of personal privilege——

Mr. STEENERSON. I mean that, too.

The SPEAKER. In the gentleman's estimation.

Mr. STEENERSON. For instance, on page 8, it says:

If Mr. STEENERSON knows anything about the ocean mail bill which he strove to defeat last spring in the House while the foreign shipping combinations rejoiced, he knows that the ocean mail bill was simply an amendment to a single section of the ocean mail law of March 3, 1891, passed during the administration of President Harrison. The defeated ocean mail bill simply asked for a restoration of the rates strongly urged by Mr. Harrison, etc.

That accuses me of falsehood in my representative capacity as to what the bill meant.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see that it does; it accuses the gentleman from having a different opinion from President Harrison on the subject.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I will submit further on page 9:

Mr. STEENERSON is again guilty of deliberate and malicious falsification when he says:

"Under the existing law our subsidized lines in the foreign trade, including the Pacific Mail and the Hill line, have the right to the fullest extent and are now and have been in the last employing the cheapest kind of labor obtainable."

Further, on page 9, it says:

The subsidized vessels——

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. On page 12 it says:

Mr. STEENERSON works for coolies.

That does not relate to anything in my letter.

The abandoned American line to Australia, while in operation, actually received under the Harrison ocean mail act less mail pay than either European and Japanese ships performing similar services for their countries. The line was withdrawn two years ago because of the defeat of the ocean mail bill providing additional compensation. Mr. STEENERSON voted against that bill, the failure of which drove American steamships, manned by American seamen, built by American material and by American workmen, off the Pacific Ocean, thus affording larger employment for the coolie labor of the Orient, and turning over to the control of foreigners all of the commerce we had with Australia, which, as a result, was completely wiped out.

And then at about the center of page 14 it says:

The New England owners of the five steamships that formerly plied between Seattle and the Orient expressed themselves as entirely willing to comply with the terms of the ocean mail law of 1891 and to employ American seamen on ships subsidized and under contract if a mail law were passed placing them on even terms with the British and the Japanese. But Congress—or rather the House—assisted by the untiring efforts of HALVOR STEENERSON, defeated this legislation.

* * * * * * *

If Congressman STEENERSON has any real solicitude for American labor, if he is in truth not throwing dust in the eyes of his constituents by declaiming against cooly labor, then he will soon have an opportunity to show his sincerity.

* * * * * * *

WHAT MANNER OF MAN IS THIS?

Is a man fit to hold high public office that will deliberately pervert and maliciously falsify the facts connected with any important public question? Is he a safe, a trustworthy man? We hold that he is not; that such a man is dishonest and an enemy to his country and his country's best interests, and that he and men like him are a constant menace to American progress at home and abroad.

There are not many such in Congress, but there will always be found a few, and the ninth district of Minnesota has one.

Now, I submit that according to the precedents, and I have some on my desk, that this goes a great deal further than, for instance, the case that is cited there, where there was a dispute between two Congressmen in the committee, and one of them made statements with reference to an outsider. The outsider sent an article to a newspaper which attacked a Member of Congress. The Member of Congress was allowed as a question of privilege to refute the article, and I have it right here.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the whole of this article relates to a letter written by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to another party, explaining his vote, perhaps, and making certain statements in regard to it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I refer the Chair to volume 3 of Hinds's Precedents, commencing at the bottom of page 1045, section 2541. This is on a question of order:

Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved—

This was on May 17, 1890, in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It begins on page 1045 and goes over on to the next page, as follows:

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, made the point of order that the question of privilege was not involved, and also that a question of personal privilege touching the right of a Member of the House of Representatives could only be made in the House of Representatives—

Of course that question is not involved here, because this is in the House.

There was no Journal in the Committee of the Whole. There was no power in the committee—

And so forth.

Then the Chairman said:

The rules of the House, so far as possible, are applicable to the Committee of the Whole.

* * * * * * *

A Member may rise and deny that he has made a certain statement without invoking any action of the House, simply permitting the denial to go into the RECORD. He would have the right to do that as a question of privilege. * * *

The rule is that in order to constitute a question of personal privilege the attack must be made upon the Member in his representative capacity. Now, what are the facts before the committee? On one of the days of this session the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Bynum] assailed—the Chair uses the term as expressive of the general generic nature of the remarks of the gentlemen—the character of a citizen of the country. That citizen now sends a letter which is intended to have some effect; whatever the ultimate effect may be, the intention is manifest.

I see by the Associated Press—

This is in quotation marks—

I see by the Associated Press report of the proceedings of Congress yesterday that Messrs. McMillin, Bynum, and Wilson made an attack on me personally. In relation to the statement of Mr. McMillin—

And so forth.

Thereupon the statement proceeds with a view of furnishing denial and refutation of the attack thus made in a representative capacity by gentlemen on the floor.

The Chair is therefore of the opinion that it is a reflection upon the gentlemen in their representative capacity, and it is a question of privilege.

And they were given the right, even though that occurred in the Committee of the Whole; but, of course——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will notice that the precedent that he reads from is quoted as covering the point that a statement could be made in Committee of the Whole while the House was in Committee of the Whole, that would involve a question of privilege in that committee. But what the question of privilege was, and what disposition was made of it, there is nothing appearing. So that the Chair suggests to the gentleman that his precedent sheds no light upon this question of privilege in the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I disagree with that conclusion, because the Chair in that case, regardless of the question whether it arose in the Committee of the Whole or not, says that this newspaper article attacked this Representative in his representative capacity. That is just exactly what this newspaper article did in regard to me. There is an absolute similarity between the two cases, and it turned just as much on that point as on the point whether or not it was in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Whatever the facts may be touching the question of privilege raised, the letter referred to does not appear in the precedent, and it is perfectly patent that it was quoted for the purpose of showing that a question of privilege could arise in Committee of the Whole House. Now, it is impossible for the Chair to tell what virtue this precedent has unless the Chair had the letter, which is not quoted in the precedent.

Mr. STEENERSON. The precedent does state that this letter in the newspaper assails Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, for what he did in Committee of the Whole—what he did in Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to the gentleman from Minnesota to know if he has any objection to having the letter printed in full in the RECORD and let the letter and point of order against it go over until Thursday, and then bring it up?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think so. Of course I would continue my remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. The point would still be pending. The Speaker would then have the chance to read the letter.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have been here seven years now, and I have known a great many gentlemen to occupy the floor with matter of less importance than this. The other day the gentleman from Tennessee, because a newspaper article which said that Congressmen had violated the franking privilege, discussed it as a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remarks shed no light——

Mr. STEENERSON. I am citing a precedent.

The SPEAKER (continuing). Upon the question of privilege. Now the Chair wants to treat his colleague the gentleman from Minnesota with the greatest deference and courtesy; but it is impossible for the Chair to get an intelligent understanding from the article just read.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am willing to agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, that the matter go over until Thursday.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the letter be printed——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the House is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken, and the House will be in order.

The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to ask unanimous consent that the letter of the gentleman and the article in the paper be printed in the RECORD, and that the matter go over until Thursday morning.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; with the point of order pending.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the incident the other day as a recent precedent in point. I also cite the following:

Section 2694, Hinds's Precedents (v. 3, p. 1140):

A newspaper charge that a Member had been influenced in his action as a Representative by the Speaker was held to involve a question of privilege.

Section 2704:

An accusation in a newspaper that certain Members had received an excess mileage pay was held to involve a question of privilege.

Section 2708:

A newspaper report charging Members of the House generally with abuse of the franking privilege was held to involve a question of privilege.

Section 2709:

A newspaper allegation that a certain number of Representatives, whose names were not given, had entered into a corrupt speculation was held to involve a question of privilege.

Section 2716:

Charges alleged to have been made against Members in the report of an agent of a foreign power and presented by a Member were held to involve a question of privilege.

Section 2718:

An employee of the House having in a newspaper charged a Member with falsehood in debate, a resolution relating thereto was held to be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear of that incident; it sheds no light on the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. It was a question of privilege.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that he can bring that up on the point of order on Thursday.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CIVIL-WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18681) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in all the Senate amendments except Senate amendment No. 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to concur in all the Senate amendments except No. 5. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House disagree to amendment numbered 5.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I understand the parliamentary situation now is that the bill goes back to the Senate to be disposed of as they choose.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 19278) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour and ten minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that all general debate close in one hour and ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I see no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I notice, with a great deal of interest, that the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has announced a new policy in relation to the hearings before that committee. This is the fifth year I have been trying to get a hearing before that committee on certain bills, and I have even introduced an amendment to the rules providing that any Member of the House, on any bill pending before a committee, with certain exceptions, shall be entitled to be heard at least ten minutes, as I now recall it, or possibly fifteen. I am glad that the chairman is going to give Members who have bills before that committee, including those who have bills in regard to letter carriers, clerks in charge of numbered stations, and so on, an opportunity to present their views. [Applause.] Here is the rule I proposed in the Sixtieth Congress and reintroduced in this:

House resolution 18.

Resolved, That Rule X be amended by adding the following section:

"63. On the written request of the Member introducing a bill, the committee to which such bill was referred shall fix a day, not more than two weeks subsequent to the receipt of the request, in which such Member may be heard as to the bill so introduced, such hearing to be limited, if the committee so directs, to ten minutes. Notice shall be sent to the Member of such meeting. Neglect to comply with this rule shall make privileged a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill. This subdivision shall not apply to the following committees: Elections, 1, 2, and 3; Invalid Pensions, Pensions, Claims, War Claims, and Enrolled Bills."

I desire to put into the RECORD a few words in relation to the city carrier. We hear a great deal about his blessings. The facts are that he starts in as a substitute at 30 cents an hour. He reports every day. Frequently he gets no employment at all, thus getting no pay and losing his expenses. Here in Washington men have been substitute carriers for as long as three years, I am informed. Finally the carrier is made regular. He starts at $600 a year and goes automatically through the classification act, which we passed three years ago, in succeeding years to $800, $900, $1,000, and $1,100. Congress has fallen into the habit of appropriating for 50 per cent of the appropriation, so that, allowing that he substituted one year, but went to $1,200 at his first opportunity, he reaches the $1,200 salary in his seventh year of service. In New York City it is not an exorbitant salary. The bricklayer gets $5.60 a day, the carpenter and the plasterer, each $4.50. In 1906 and the first part of 1907 the resignations of carriers to go into better positions were numerous.

The clerk also starts at the bottom and gets to the $1,200 grade at about his seventh year. The carrier has an eight-hour law; the clerk has none. The distinguished chairman of the committee stated that the average day of the clerk is but a little more than eight hours. Later he admitted that he had not included Sunday work in his calculation; neither did he include the hours spent at home studying city and distribution schemes necessary to be known to pass the efficiency tests required by the department. The classification law has improved both the clerk and carrier service. The increased pay keeps good men in and makes them more contented. A retirement law is the next step, and, in my judgment, not a far-distant one. I append a paper prepared by the Postal Progress League:

A FREIGHT, PASSENGER, AND INTELLIGENCE POST THE PUBLIC NEED.

In his article "Ethics of corporate management," in the North American Review of January 18, 1907, President Hadley, of Yale University, said that the demands of the various railway commissions for increased power in order to enable them to cope with the difficulties of the railroad problem reminded him of the minister in the country church who said, "O, Lord, we pray for power; O, Lord, we pray for power," until an old deacon, unable to contain himself, interrupted, "Tain't power you lack, my young man; its idees."

Far back in 1837 Rowland Hill, of England, discovered to the world the "idee" that within the limits of a public transport service the cost of its use is regardless the distance traversed by any unit of traffic upon the moving machinery, and upon this "idee" Mr. Hill based the English penny letter post of 1839.

To-day this "idee" is the recognized law not only of the modern postal service of the world, it is the law of our city trolley services and of the through freight services of our railways. * * *

THE POST-OFFICE—OUR MUTUAL TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

The post-office is our mutual transportation company. Its management, the terms and conditions of its use, are subject to our will. Its only physical limitation is the capacity of the machinery of transportation. It is the only public transportation agency that covers the whole country.

Its underlying principles are: Rates regardless of distance, regardless of the character or the volume of the matter transported; rates determined by the representatives of the ratepayers in Congress assembled, and on the cost of the service rendered. Within its limits all persons, places, and things are on a plane of the most perfect commercial equality. Up to its limits the humblest citizen on the most out-of-the way rural route is on a par with the richest corporation in our greatest metropolis.

In his speech in favor of a uniform 2-cent letter rate, delivered in Congress February 21, 1839, Congressman Palfrey, of Massachusetts, spoke of the postal system of uniform rates as follows:

"The idea of charging higher postage on a letter on account of the greater distance it travels is an absurdity. The long routes are all made up of a series of short ones. Whether the letter or the 10,000 letters mailed at Boston shall stop at Worcester or go on to Galena will not make $1 difference in the contract." Says Rowland Hill: "It is not a matter of inference, but a matter of fact that the expense of the post-office is practically the same, whether a letter is going from London to a village 11 miles distant or to Edinborough, 397 miles. The difference is not expressable in the smallest coin we have. The average cost of the transportation of each letter, taking all the mails in the Kingdom, is estimated at one-ninth of a farthing." At this rate the average cost of the transportation of a half ounce American letter is about one-half a mill, a rate which it is idle to think of graduating by distance.

At 10 cents a mile for transportation of a mail bag it may cost the department a dollar to carry a single letter 10 miles, while 10,000 letters of another bag are carried at the same rate 100 miles, each costing for ten times the distance only one-thousandth part as much.

In 1862 Postmaster-General Montgomery Blair suggested the application of this principle to a world postal service. In 1863, under the leadership of Abraham Lincoln, it was made the basis of the modern United States post-office. In 1874 it became the basic principle of the new-born World Postal Union, under which books are now posted anywhere throughout the world at a common rate of 1 cent each 2 ounces, 8 cents a pound, and in this same year the United States Congress established a general merchandise post, limited to 4-pound parcels, at the common world book rate for all distances within our territory. The Congress of 1885 gave to magazines and newspapers—registered second-class matter—a uniform cent a pound rate, and thus provided the American people with the greatest public school on earth.

American express companies apply this principle of uniform rates in their transportation of books, seeds, bulbs, etc., for planting—third-class mail matter—throughout their respective jurisdictions—New York to California—in parcels 10 pounds and over, at a rate just under that of the post-office, with insurance up to $10. On magazines and newspapers—registered second-class mail matter—their uniform rates are: Parcels, up to 10 pounds, 10 cents; larger parcels, 1 cent a pound, collect and deliver within distances covered by their merchandise rate of $4.50 a hundred pounds or within zones of 1,500 miles, east or west of the Ohio-Pennsylvania state line.

This principle of uniform rates is applied in the trolley service of every American city, and to it more than to anything else they owe their wonderful growth and prosperity. In 1888, Judge Cooley, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said of the then existing uniform railway milk rates to New York, distances up to 220 miles: "It has served the people well. It tends to promote consumption and to stimulate production. It is not apparent how any other system could be devised that would present results equally useful or more just."

RAILROADS DEFEND UNIFORM MILK RATES.

In 1895 this uniform milk rate, which then covered distances up to 330 miles, was attacked by the Orange County milkmen on the issue that it deprived them of their natural monopoly of the New York milk market. The Hon. Joseph H. Choate, of New York, represented the milkmen. Messrs. Rogers, Locke & Milburn represented the railroads. At that time the uniform rates from points west of the Hudson to the railroad terminals opposite New York City were as follows:

On cream in 40-quart cans, 100-pound packets, 50 cents per packet, one-half cent a pound; in crates of 12-quart bottles, 70-pound packets, 15 cents per packet, a trifle less than one-fourth cent a pound; on milk, 32 cents per packet, less than one-third cent a pound in cans; 9.6 cents per packet, one-seventh cent a pound in crated bottles. The empty packets weighed, cans, about 20 pounds; crated bottles, 30 to 35 pounds. The weight of the filled-bottle packets was partly due to the ice in which they were packed, and the above rates paid not only for two handlings of these filled packages and their transportation to the Hudson, opposite New York; they also covered the icing of the milk in summer, the heating of the cars in winter, and the return of the empty packets to their stations of origin.

UNIFORM RATES TOO HIGH.

With all this service the business was exceedingly remunerative to all engaged in the traffic, their rates, according to Mr. Choate, being from two to three times the cost of the service rendered. In the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad the business was so profitable that the railroad managers actually paid their milk contractor, Westcott, $50,000 a year as his share of the plunder. In the case of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, which then transported about one-fourth of the milk brought by rail to New York, the president of the road determined the rates, and accepted as the share of his associate stockholders 80 per cent of the receipts, giving 20 per cent to Westcott. In other words, the actual milk pay received by the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad was 25.6 cents per 40-quart milk can, weighing filled 100 pounds, empty 20 pounds, and about the dimensions of a half barrel; and on bottled crates, weighing filled 75 pounds, empty 30 to 35 pounds, and of dimensions 12 by 12 by 24 inches (1½ bushels), 7.68 cents; 83 per cent of the entire business originated beyond Binghamton, N. Y., 206 miles from Hoboken, and on this part of the business every car and crate was hauled a round trip of at least 412 miles, each single trip involving a haul of heavy grades over the Catskill Mountains on special trains made up of refrigerator cars costing about $2,500 each, iced in summer and heated in winter. The Lackawanna milk trains average eight cars, and ran on a schedule time of 40 to 45 miles an hour. The average load of the cars was 160 cans, weighing filled on their way to New York 8 tons and on the return trip 1⅞ tons. In this business, according to Mr. Choate, the milk cars of the Erie Railroad earned 26 times as much as the average freight car and nearly 80 per cent more than their average passenger car.

This old New York milk traffic compares well with the mail service rendered the Government by the railroads, and exceedingly well with their traffic in second-class mail sacks. The transport of the mail sacks is, indeed, less costly to the roads and less injurious to their cars than that of either milk cans or milk crates. Rates that proved so wonderfully profitable to the railroads in the milk traffic can be made equally profitable in mail service. Congress has but to provide for the government ownership of its mail cars (its wooden mail bags), paying the railways a certain definite rate per mile for their transportation, full or empty, and with a low uniform rate on merchandise, postal cars will always run well filled, at little if any more cost to the Government than it is now paying for cars occupied to hardly a fifth of their capacity, and postal deficits will disappear.

RAILROADS DEMAND UNIFORM CONTINENTAL RATES.

In December, 1895, Commissioner George R. Blanchard, of the Joint Traffic Association, testifying in behalf of the uniform rate on milk to New York before the Interstate Commerce Commission, declared that there was no reason why it should not be extended to a thousand miles, and Messrs. Rogers, Locke & Milburn, counsel of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, said:

"The distance, within which the rate on milk should be uniform, need only be limited by the time required to make it with the train and meet the wants of the New York market with milk not affected by its transportation.

"The cost of train operation is not appreciably more whether there be 200 cans in a car, or 160 cans in a car, or 10 cans in a car. The same crew, the same messengers and organization, and the same terminal service have to be maintained whether the car be carried from Binghamton or not, or from Sussex County or not, and the cost of the delivery of the can at the Hoboken terminal is in no real sense dependent upon the length of its haul."

In his great work, The Economic Theory of Railway Location, Arthur M. Wellington says: "As a matter of purely public policy—that is to say, if the interests of the railways were identical with the interests of the community as a whole—railway rates should be the same for all distances."

Note also this testimony as to the uniform rates of the railways in their through traffic, set forth before the railway-rate committee of the United States Senate of 1905 at Washington:

IOWA'S PROSPERITY DUE TO APPLICATION OF THE POSTAL PRINCIPLE IN THROUGH RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

Hon. L. S. Coffin, late railroad commissioner of Iowa: "Some forty years ago the agricultural papers announced the fact that a shipment of butter from Davenport, Iowa, and a shipment of butter from central New York, and a similar shipment from St. Albans, Vt., were brought to Boston in the same car, and the freight rate on the butter from St. Albans and from central New York was the same as that from Davenport." And Mr. Coffin went on to say that the position of Iowa as the foremost of the States in agriculture was due to the fact that this system of uniform rates on dairy products had put her on a level as to the cost of transportation with localities 500 or 1,000 miles nearer the great marts of trade. To this custom was due the fact that his farm, which is a thousand miles farther from the great markets of New York and Boston, was worth as much for dairy purposes as farms in New York or Vermont. It was this application of the postal principle to railway traffic that had brought to him his prosperity and had enabled him to so educate his children that they could be as intelligent as the children of farmers living near those great markets. "We want this same thing to go on; we want the farmers a thousand miles away from a great market to be as prosperous and his children to have the same and as good facilities for intelligence as the children of farmers only a hundred miles away," and, finally, he concluded: "There should be no wholesale rates as against retail rates; no more so than in buying postage stamps."

GROUPED RATES IN THROUGH TRAFFIC DEVELOP AGRICULTURE IN THE WEST, MANUFACTURES IN THE EAST.

Prof. Hugo R. Meyer, late of Chicago University: "The one thing which has done more than all others for the development of this country is the common custom of the railways to group large districts of territory with a uniform rate regardless of distance. Except for this system of grouped rates we never should have seen the years when we built 10,000 and 12,000 miles of railway, for there would have been no farmers west of the Mississippi River who could have used the land opened up by those railways. Except for these grouped rates we could not have in New England a great boot and shoe industry or a great cotton milling industry; we could not have spread throughout New York and Pennsylvania and Ohio manufacturing industries of the most diversified kinds, because those industries would have had no market among the farmers west of the Mississippi River."

THE EXISTENCE OF NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRIES DEPENDENT ON THROUGH UNIFORM RATES.

President Tuttle, of the Boston and Maine Railroad.—"The boot and shoe industry of New England flourishes," says Mr. Tuttle, "because of the common rate—1½ cents per pair on shoes carried 20 to 1,400 miles. The barbed-wire industry of Worcester, Mass., continues to employ 5,000 hands because of the common rate which Worcester enjoys with Pittsburg to all the west. The textile industries of Massachusetts flourish because of their grouped rates over a great part of the United States."

THROUGH UNIFORM RATES CREATE NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRY.

But this system of low uniform rates not only keeps industries flourishing; it creates industries. "In the northern part of Maine," says Mr. Tuttle, "there are hundreds of thousands of acres of spruce lands. Up to within ten years ago, in certain parts of Maine, there were no inhabitants. At a certain place there was primeval forest, not containing even a hundred cabins. A railroad was put into that territory—the Bangor and Aroostook. Certain capitalists discussed the establishment of a pulp and paper mill in that region. They selected a place where they could bond a large quantity of timber land, with a good water power, and where the other conditions for manufacturing were satisfactory, and called it Millinocket.

"NEAR-BY MARKETS TOO SMALL FOR MODERN INDUSTRIES.

"In order to establish a profitable industry up there it was necessary to manufacture upon a scale sufficiently large to make the product cheap, and this meant a production very much in excess of what could be used in the nearer markets. So they came to the railroad and said: 'We want to know what rate you will charge to carry our products to Boston, New York, and Chicago, and all about us, and then we can determine whether we can build that mill.' Then the railroad had to bear in mind that Chicago was receiving paper from other mills within 500 miles from Chicago, and if the Maine mill was to compete with these mills it must have the same rate for its 1,400 to 1,500 mile haul as they had for the 500-mile haul. The railroad therefore equalized its rates, so that the company could put their products into the markets of the United States. As a result, we have this place Millinocket, with its schools, churches, streets, electric lights, and its population of 3,000 or 4,000, who live as comfortably as they do anywhere in the world, a place where ten years ago it was primeval forest. To illustrate further in regard to this product, paper, we have other mills in different parts of New England producing paper which is sent to the same markets. We have to equalize the cost of transport, regardless of distance between all these mills, so that the product shall be sold in the market at the same price."

WHY NOT HAVE UNIFORM RATES IN ALL PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION?

Manifestly a system of transport rates so useful in through traffic could hardly fail to be of equal benefit in local business. Strange as it may appear, however, though our railways ignore distance over continental areas, they carefully mark up the miles in local traffic, and investigation will prove that in many cases the very lowest less-than-carload rate for the very shortest distance is higher than the through rate for very long distances. In the course of the legislative hearings at Boston in 1900, relative to the issue "The state management of the Boston and Albany Railroad v. The New York Central management of this great state highway," President Tuttle, of the Boston and Maine Railroad, gave these as the figures charged for the transportation of flour in carloads from Ogdensburg, 429 miles via the Rutland Railroad and his own road, to Boston:

	Cents.
For transportation, 429 miles	7.2
Terminal charges at Boston for handling and delivering the barrel, guaranteeing its safety, collecting charges, and paying back to the lines from the West their share of the transportation tax	3
Total	10.2

The less-than-carload rate on a single barrel of flour over the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, Hartford to Wethersford, 4 miles, is 25 cents; in quantities of several barrels, 12 cents. Taking the average haul of general produce at 429 miles, it would seem clear that a common 12-cent rate for the railway transport of 200-pound parcels of all kinds of commodities would provide all the revenues needed from all railway freight traffic. The average tax levied by the railways of the United States for the transport of all kinds of freight in 1907 was about $1.06 a ton, or a trifle over 5 cents a hundred. The average passenger tax was about 65 cents per trip, this for trains filled to hardly a sixth of their capacity.

Mr. Childs, general manager of the Erie Railroad, testifying before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the milk case of 1895, already referred to, said that as railway business increases the cost of the service decreases in the ratio of 25 per cent for every 100 per cent increase of traffic; in other words, "if the business be doubled the cost is diminished 25 per cent per unit of persons or produce transported. There is no extra cost in extra speed, because any possible extra expense involved in making fast time is offset by the increased service thus secured from the engine."

"It is a principle of transportation," declared the general freight agent of the Erie, H. B. Chamberlain, "that the constant movement of cars is what makes profit for a road. It's the constantly moving wheel which makes the profit. In the traffic of the roads running into New York these milk cars, which are constantly on the move, although not heavily loaded, carry over four times as much traffic in the course of a year as the ordinary box car."

With public transportation under the complete control of a council composed, say, of the officers of the Post-Office Department, of the governors of the different States, and of army and navy engineers, we believe that the public transport business of this country might be supported by a system of uniform, cost-of-the-service, station-to-station rates as follows:

Rates regardless of distance.

Freight rates, regardless of character of commodities or volume of business:

Closed cars, 5 cents per haul per 100 pounds.

Open cars, not over 50 cents, possibly as low as 40 cents, per haul per ton.

Passenger rates.

Fast trains, stopping at intervals 40 miles or more	$1.00
Express trains, making more frequent stops	.25
Way trains, stopping at all stations	.05

EVILS OF PRESENT TRANSPORT DISCRIMINATIONS—BIG DEALERS GIVEN LOW UNIFORM RATES OVER CONTINENTAL AREAS—SMALL DEALERS IMPRISONED IN NARROW SLAVE PENS.

Under present conditions the value-of-the-service system of rates, rates according to distance and the value of the service rendered, is quite strictly applied in general passenger traffic and in local freight traffic. In through freight traffic, on the other hand, large dealers and large producers are generally given uniform rates over large areas of territory regardless at once of distance and of the character of their commodities. As to travel, they are usually provided with cheap mileage books, if not with free travel. Almost all westbound commodities destined to Pacific coast terminals have a common blanket rate, regardless of distance and regardless of the character of the commodity from all points east of the Missouri River, and on their eastbound traffic from the Pacific coast terminals to points east of the Missouri River they also enjoy a common blanket rate on their through carloads over zones of many hundreds of miles.

ORDINARY CITIZENS TAXED "ALL THE SUBJECT WILL BEAR."

The ordinary citizen, on the other hand, receives very different treatment. Unable to invest in a thousand-mile mileage book, my tax New York to and from Washington is $11.30. My wealthier friend, occupying the seat beside me and the owner of a mileage book, pays for the same service $9.04, and Congress, whose business it is to secure equality of privileges and rights to all the people, forces the ordinary citizens of the United States to submit to this discriminating taxation. The day laborer is infinitely worse off than I. Even under the best conditions—with fares at but 2 cents a mile—he is taxed 20 cents—10 per cent of his $2 a day earnings—for a round trip to and from a short job, but 5 miles from his home. If his job be 25 miles distant, his round trip costs him $1, or 50 per cent of his earnings. This for a service which, under government ownership of the railways, could be profitably done at a charge of not over 10 cents a round trip. The government railways of Belgium furnished even lower rates than this to Belgium workmen as long ago as 1883, and the business was exceedingly profitable.

INDIVIDUAL ENTERPRISE CRUSHED—SMALL DEALERS AND SMALL PRODUCERS DRIVEN OUT OF EXISTENCE—THE BIG TOWN ENRICHED, THE SMALL TOWN IMPOVERISHED.

The small dealer and the small producer suffers the same discriminating taxation as the workman. The rates on their local traffic and their less-than-carload business are sometimes 50 per cent higher than those of their great competitors engaged in carload traffic covering continental areas. The great dealer of the interior unquestionably sends his produce to Europe on occasion at a less tax than that levied on similar produce of the small dealer sent to our seaboard for home consumption. The large towns at railway terminals get far lower rates than are accorded to the smaller towns between the terminals.

THE PRIVATE EXPRESS COMPANY KILLS THE SMALL TOWN.

The private express custom of taxing additional rate for each line over which a parcel passes makes the establishment of a business requiring express service in small towns an impossibility. Such business must be located, if it would be successful at great centers, where several express lines diverge and where supplies and produce are usually subject to but one expressage.

Boise, Idaho, is controlled by the Pacific Express Company. Buffalo and Cleveland, on the Pacific Express line, enjoy several other express services. The smaller towns near by, subject to a second express charge, pay nearly twice as much as Buffalo and Cleveland on their Pacific Express business; to Boise, Idaho, on 8-pound parcels from Buffalo, N. Y., 2,437 miles, $1.20; Batavia, N. Y., 2,473 miles, $2.20; Cleveland, Ohio, 2,295 miles, $1.20; Euclid, Ohio, 2,306 miles, $2.20. With similar discriminations on all their express business, the fate of these smaller towns is evident.

THE PRIVATE EXPRESS COMPANY KILLS THE SMALL MANUFACTURER, FARMER, AND DEALER.

Rates from New York: Where the express rate on a 100-pound parcel is 40 cents, two 50-pound parcels pay 80 cents; four 25-pound parcels pay $1.40; ten 10-pound parcels pay $3. Where a 100-pound parcel pays $1, two 50-pound parcels pay $1.60; four 25-pound parcels pay $2.20; ten 10-pound parcels pay $4.50.

The smaller the business, the higher the tax; the small business goes to the wall. The late 300 per cent dividend of the Wells-Fargo Express Company is striking evidence of the express exploitation of the general public.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION.

"Our present system of making railway rates," said Interstate Commerce Commissioner Prouty, January 12, 1903, "is taxation without representation in its most dangerous form." This taxation now amounts to over $2,500,000,000 a year, to over $150 a year for the average American family. In the determination of these taxes the taxpayers have no share. These taxes continue to be levied upon the principle "what the subject will bear." They always discriminate in favor of the big dealer and the big producer as against the small dealer and the small producer and against the little town and in favor of the big town. The result is the rapid concentration of our population in great cities within which laborers are huddled in narrow slave pens, while those who are enriched by this taxation live in palaces in other sections of the same city.

And the railway legislation proposed for the consideration of the Sixty-first Congress offers us a future almost worse than the past. The railway speculators left in control of our public highways are to be deprived of inducements for the improvement and extension of their transport agencies, while transport taxation is to be left in a chaos that can not fail to result in widespread disaster.

PREDICTION OF CARROLL D. WRIGHT, 1894.

The Hon. Carroll D. Wright foretold the present condition of things in his notable address on the Chicago strike of June, 1894:

"The Chicago strike is epochal in its influence," he said, "because it emphasizes the claim that there must be some legislation which shall place railroad employees on a par with railroad employers in conducting the business of transportation, so far as the terms and conditions of employment are concerned; because the events of that strike logically demand that another declaration of law and of the principles of the Federal Government shall be made; a declaration that all wages paid as well as charges for any service rendered in the transportation of property, passengers, etc., shall be reasonable and just. It has emphasized the power of the Federal Government to protect its great interests in the transportation of the mails."

Personally, he added, he was opposed to the government management of the railroads, but if it came, it would come because of a great necessity, and good citizens should have no fear. When it came, moreover, it would be not at the demand of the labor involved in carrying on the work of transportation, but "at the demand and in the interest of the railroads and of the shippers," and the movement would be most seductive.

The demand would be that the Government should take charge of the roads—not purchase them—should take charge of the roads, and out of the proceeds of the transportation business guarantee to the existing stockholders a small but reasonable dividend. And this seductive movement would command the support of the conservative men of the country, of the stockholders themselves.

RAILWAYS—POST-ROADS.

This dictum thrown out by Ex-President Roosevelt in his speeches at Indianapolis, Ind., and at Lansing, Mich., in the spring of 1907 suggests the seductive movement predicted by Mr. Wright, and the times now seem ripe for its consideration.

A TRANSPORT PROGRAMME.

* * * * * * *

President Roosevelt's reference to the railways as post-roads suggests the following transport programme:

1. Government control and guaranty of fair return on investments.

The National Government, under its constitutional power over post-roads, to take control of the entire business of public transportation and to guarantee to the holders of transport securities a return on their investments equal to the average annual return of the past ten years, a similar return on their cost to be guaranteed on roads recently built. (This will insure absolute safety to the investments of savings banks and similar associations. It will insure more than a square deal to railway speculators.)

2. Maintenance, extension, and operations of post-roads.

The maintenance, extension, and operation of the consolidated system to be under the control and management of an extended postal department, including the engineering corps of the army and navy; all postal employees to be enlisted as men are now enlisted in the army and navy. The government engineers intrusted with the building and maintenance of the Panama Canal may be safely intrusted with the care of all our public highways. To prevent waste, the post-road policy of the National Government should be the same as the highway policy of the different States, viz: Any community, town, county, or State asking for an extension of post-roads should pay some share of the cost. Local roads may, perhaps, be left to local control, as local roads are now left to the care of the smaller communities within the different States. But the whole business must be under the general jurisdiction of the National Government.

3. Funds.

As to funds, United States 2 per cent thirty-year bonds are worth 101. The new postal savings banks will offer the Government an opportunity to secure funds for the improvement and extension of its post-roads at 2 per cent. A large part of the funds needed for this purpose may be secured, indeed, without the payment of any interest by the issue of postal notes—orders for postal services—with blank payable-to-order spaces, to continue in circulation as currency until made payable to particular individuals, and may be redeemed at the various post and railway offices of the country with new currency.

4. Tolls, freight rates.

Make the very lowest less than carload rate on merchandise the uniform rate for the station to station service, adding thereto the lowest possible rate for collection and delivery, to the end that we may have a universal door-to-door rate within the entire public service.

* * * * * * *

The possibilities as to low transport rates under a well-coordinated system of transportation are altogether beyond imagination. It is estimated that a saving of $50,000,000 a year could be made in the transport service of the city of New York alone if the entire business were in the hands of one well-equipped organization, run in the public interest. Vice-President Buckland, of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, is quoted as saying that $15,000,000 a year could be saved to the people within his railroad province under a door-to-door freight-transport service undertaken by the railroad in connection with the trolley lines. The time is near at hand when heat and light and power, derived from coal, transformed into electricity at the mine, and conveyed by cable to the place of use will free the railroad from the transport of coal, and the cars now employed for this purpose will be free for the transport of general merchandise.

5. Hours and wages of labor.

Not over eight hours per day, not over forty-eight hours a week, the hours and the wages of labor to be determined by the Representatives of the people in open Congress. (Experience has abundantly proved that long hours of service in this nerve-destroying employment are at once dangerous to the public and deathly to the workman. Insured through his Representatives in Congress a share in determining the hours of his work and his remuneration, the worker upon the post-roads will have no occasion to strike.)

6. The extended post-office department.

The new department of post-offices and post-roads to manage the entire service of transportation and transmission may be composed of one member of the National Cabinet and ten or more associates, each of whom shall be at the head of a postal division corresponding to one of the groups into which the railway system of the country has been divided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shall be responsible for the postal business within his territory. This department may be assisted by an advisory council made up of the governors of the different States.

The pending substitution of electricity for steam, resulting as it surely will in a very large reduction of transportation expenses, makes the present hour a most appropriate time for the consideration of this programme. Uncle Sam, the representative of all of us, may be safely intrusted with the interests of each of us.

"Upon the postal service more than upon anything else does the general economic as well as the social and political development of the country depend." (Postal Commission, 59th Cong., Jan. 28, 1907.)

And what is true of the United States of America is equally true of the United States of the postal world.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MALBY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4446. An act to give the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power in regard to the improvement of the post-office and court-house at Wilmington, Del.; and

S. 6168. An act creating a government business methods commission.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 2072. An act to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan;

S. 2445. An act for the relief of Peter Fleming;

S. 6072. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4672. An act to correct the military record of William Keyes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, in rising to offer these few remarks on the pending bill I wish to congratulate the committee and the country for the wisdom and good judgment shown by the committee upon the important question of second-class mail matter, in leaving the rate of postage unchanged on this class of mail. In my humble opinion, their action will be approved by the public in general.

I also believe that the committee will be commended for their action in incorporating into the bill a provision to stop the Government from being a competitor with the printers of the country. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I can not go on and approve of all that the committee has done in drafting this bill. I believe they have made a mistake in limiting the appropriation for Rural Delivery Service to practically the same amount appropriated last year.

We should have at least $5,000,000 more than this bill carries, and it is with a certain degree of hope that the committee will accept an amendment for an increase in the amount of appropriations for rural carriers, for the maintenance of all rural routes now in operation, and for the establishment and maintenance of routes which have been favorably reported, but upon which action has been suspended for lack of funds, still leaving a balance which can be used in the establishment of routes which may be authorized during the coming year.

I can to a certain extent sympathize with the committee in their efforts to keep appropriations down to as small a sum as possible, providing it will result in true economy to the Government—and when I say the Government, I mean the people, because they are the Government. Those of us who appreciate the benefits of the Rural Delivery Service fully realize that the services performed by the rural carriers, especially in the western States, where the routes are long and the climatic conditions are severe, are performed by them more as a patriotic duty, at a real sacrifice, than for gain or profit. We had hoped at this time to be able to tell these patriots, who have been patiently knocking at our door for better pay, that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads recognize the value of their service to the people to the extent of allowing an increase in their salary of $25 per month. I am sure that such action would be approved by a large majority of the Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the present pay of the rural carrier is wholly inadequate. Mr. W. D. Brown, editor of the Rural Free Delivery News, has collected a lare number of facts in regard to this, and his statement shows that the average net earnings of the rural mail carriers in the United States for the six months ending December, 1909, were $189, or $31.50 per month. In North Dakota the average was only $167 for six months, or $27.66 per month. This is the lowest salary paid to anyone in the service of the United States Government. Why practice such rigid economy in the performance of so valuable a service? The people in the rural districts are entitled to a good mail service as well as the people who live in our cities and towns. I do not complain because the letter carrier in the city receives a salary of $100 per month; I am glad that he receives a fair pay for his services. But what about the rural carrier, who receives 25 per cent less, or only $75 per month, and then has to furnish and maintain his own equipment? The present arrangement is a gross discrimination against the rural carrier, and one of which he rightly complains.

In my opinion, it is a great mistake to commence the practice of economy in the distribution of mail. Every citizen of the United States should enjoy the privilege of receiving his mail promptly and properly. This bill carries some $37,000,000 for Rural Delivery Service, and a total appropriation of $240,000,000. It is said that the rural service caused a deficit of more than $24,000,000, but those who are urging this as a reason for retrenchment forget that 60 per cent of our population live in the rural districts. Admitting that this service causes a deficit of $24,000,000, it is a small sum to pay for the service rendered. It is hardly necessary to remind you that the total appropriations every year exceed $1,000,000,000.

The rural service was initiated by the Republican party. Let us see what we promised the people in our platform adopted at the Chicago convention in 1908, the platform upon which every Republican was elected, from President down. This is what the platform contains:

We favor the extension of free rural mail delivery until every community in the land receives the full benefit of the postal service.

Shall we keep faith with the people to whom these promises were made or shall we violate our pledge? I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of my Republican colleagues to this plank in our platform. The very least expected of us by the people is that we appropriate sufficient money to enable the department to establish rural routes where conditions warrant it. There is at present in the Post-Office Department more than 2,000 cases in which the prospective patrons of rural routes have petitioned for their establishment, and have fulfilled all requirements of the law and of the department, and where the department has found that conditions fully warrant the establishment of the proposed routes, but action on which has been suspended as a measure of economy. In my State alone there are 99 of these cases. I wish to insert at this point a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, showing the number of routes in North Dakota, the number of cases favorably reported on but upon which action has been suspended, and the number of petitions for rural routes at present pending:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 24, 1910.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your inquiry of this date by telephone, you are advised that the records of this office show the following:

Number of rural routes in operation in North Dakota	426
Number of cases favorably reported upon which action has been suspended	99
Number of petitions for rural routes now pending	22

Very respectfully,

P V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

It seems to me that it must be clear to anyone who will give the matter consideration that it is false economy, as well as a violation of party pledges, to fail to provide adequately for the maintenance of this service. At this time we are much exercised about the high prices of food products, and yet fail to see that a daily mail service in the rural districts will bring relief. In my opinion, the only way to remedy this condition is to bring the consumer in close contact with the producer, thereby benefiting both. The appointment of committees will, in my judgment, be as useless and will bring to those most interested the same degree of relief and satisfaction as a political stump speech would to a hungry man. It is not promises that we want, but action. The citizens in the rural districts can always be depended upon to do their duty, but they will not accept party promises which seem to be made only to be broken. They expect results, and are fully determined to have results.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this question to which I wish to call attention. We have been reminded, time and again, by thoughtful men that our people are flocking to the cities; that boys brought up on the farm leave the farm and go to the city, in larger numbers some years than in others, but in large numbers every year; and that few people leave the city for the farm. The result of this constant drain is that an ever-increasing proportion of our population lives in the cities and an ever-decreasing proportion is engaged in agricultural pursuits. It is hardly necessary for me to call your attention to the ensuing danger if this process goes too far. An ever-decreasing rural population will not always be able to produce enough to sustain an ever-increasing urban population.

Our lands are not now producing as much per acre as they might with other methods of cultivation, and this is largely due to a scarcity of farm labor. If farm life is to be made attractive to the American boy, if the tide which is so strongly setting toward the city is to be turned the other way, it must be done by increasing the advantages of farm life, not by denying the farmers advantages to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

Are we doing our duty as representatives of the people if we curtail the postal service, one of the most important services that the Government is performing? Do you realize that in pursuing a policy which prevents the establishment of 2,000 rural routes where conditions warrant their establishment we are denying to 1,000,000 of our people a service to which they are entitled, for which they are paying, and which they have had every reason to believe would be provided for them? Are we fulfilling our oath of office in acquiescing in this policy? It may be true that the Post-Office Department could be run on a more economical basis, that it could perform the same service as at present at a smaller cost, but I submit that the way to economize is not to curtail the service that is rendered or that ought to be rendered. We are not yet so poor but that we can afford to make liberal provision for a service which is more important in the diffusion of knowledge and interchange of ideas than any other rendered by the Government. I appeal to the members of the committee and to the Members of this House not to permit the passage of this bill until such changes have been made as will make adequate provision for the extension of the Rural Delivery Service wherever warranted. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 18019. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19403. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] in his remarks just now indicates that he has come to the conclusion that because there is not in the pending appropriation bill any reference to a change in the rate on second-class mail matter the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have concluded not to take any action on that subject. I think I ought to say to him and the House that that matter is now under consideration by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the fact that no reference is made to it in this appropriation bill does not indicate whether action will or will not be recommended to the House later on.

I now ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to use the balance of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] twenty minutes.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, on the 25th day of January I introduced in the House—and in the usual course it was referred to the Committee on Census—the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives whether enumerators of the census are permitted to do extra work not a part of their duties as enumerators, but demanded of them as a condition of their appointment.

On the 11th day of February, by its chairman, the majority of the committee reported the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table. As soon as the report was read, on motion of the chairman of the committee, the report was adopted. The motion cut off debate, and no opportunity to explain the reason for offering it was given. Hence, I deem proper at this time to state to the House the reason that prompted the offering of the resolution.

A few days before the resolution was offered there appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and other newspapers a letter, with a short explanation from the writer, which I will now read:

CARUTHERSVILLE, MO., September 9, 1909.

DEAR FRIEND: I received your letter and note all you say about being appointed census enumerator. Your being a Republican is the first qualification, and you are O. K. in that line. You probably will be asked to do some extra work, not a part of your duty as enumerator, if you are appointed, but it is such work as any enthusiastic Republican will be glad to do, and will in no way conflict with your duty as enumerator.

This extra work will be outlined to you before you are appointed, so that you need not accept the appointment if you do not desire to do what will be asked of you.

You get the indorsement of your county committee, and then if you are willing to do the extra work, I think you will have easy sailing.

Yours, very truly,

C. A. CROW.

"I did not realize how strictly President Taft intended his order," said Mr. CROW to-day. "The instructions I referred to as likely to be forthcoming were that the enumerators were to report informally to the Republican county or the district committee as to the sentiment they found—if the section they canvassed was filled with insurgent sentiment or whether it was inclined to stick by the regular party, or if there was defection that might take men out of the party altogether. We wanted to know where we stood, and this seemed a good and, I am sure, a legitimate way of ascertaining the lay of the land."

Mr. Chairman, in view of the debate that has heretofore taken place concerning this very remarkable document, I do not care to enter upon a discussion of it just now.

Had the usual courtesy observed by the committees of this House been extended to its author, either in the committee room or on this floor, I would not now call it to the attention of the House. Is there a Member on this floor, outside the majority of the Census Committee, that indorses the letter, in view of the oft-repeated declarations of the majority that the census will be taken in a fair, nonpartisan manner?

The action of the majority of the Committee on Census clearly shows that they approve it and do not propose to in any manner become a party to the taking of a fair, nonpartisan census, else why do they refuse to give the House the information sought? What is it the resolution asks for? Only that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—

Inform the House if the census enumerators will be permitted to do extra work, not a part of their duties as enumerators, but demanded of them as a condition of their appointment.

Anything wrong about that resolution? Why not have the information from headquarters—from the one man in this administration that can speak authoritatively upon this question?

If you are honest in your shouting for a nonpartisan census and the things set out in the letter and statement of the writer will not be permitted, who is better qualified to tell us of that fact? We must not lose sight of the fact that the writer is a Member of this House and is presumed to state the exact facts in relation to public matters. We are fully warranted in believing that the statements in the letter are true. If not true, why not submit the evidence of their falsity? If not made with the approval at least of those charged with this work, why is the majority of the Census Committee afraid to produce the evidence? The law is that where a party has possession of evidence and refuses upon request to produce it, it is taken to be against him; and the court would indulge the presumption that everything alleged against the party was true. This evidence is in your possession, you refuse to produce it, and it is not wrong to draw the conclusion that the law presumes under like circumstances; that is, that the letter of my colleague was not written without full knowledge on his part that no information would be forthcoming that would in the least tend to discredit him.

If you are honestly in favor of a nonpartisan census, why not show it by discrediting the written declaration of a Member of this House, who, if his letter and statement be true, proves conclusively that such is not your intention, that you are not in favor of a nonpartisan census?

You may lay resolutions of inquiry on the table, but you can not prevent the people reading and forming their conclusions from your conduct.

In some cases actions speak louder than words, and this is one of that class of cases.

During the three years that I have been a Member of this body I have consumed as little of the time of the House as any Member here, and would not now trespass further on your time and patience had it not been for the remarkable speech of my colleague from the fourteenth district [Mr. CROW], the writer of the letter just read.

However, when a Member of this House wantonly and without cause assails the people of the State I in part represent, it is meet and proper that reply should be made, not in kind, but by a plain statement of facts and the law as it exists in the State of Missouri, touching elections. I do not believe there is a State in this Union that has a more just, nonpartisan, nonpolitical election law than has the State of Missouri, and there are no people anywhere in this broad land of ours more jealous of the political rights of its citizens than is a genuine Missourian, whether native born or adopted. [Applause.]

I believe it is true that men usually act from some preconceived idea or motive in all matters of public interest; therefore, I am bound to presume that my colleague either acted upon his own judgment after mature deliberation, and after he had finished his lunch, or upon the advice of the distinguished gentleman he visited the night before. Whether the visit was made upon invitation or otherwise, my informant sayeth not.

The moving cause that produced the outbreak of my colleague was the position in which he found himself after the reading of the letter written by him, and of which he frankly admits the authorship. He told the House it was read while he was at lunch, meaning to infer that advantage was taken of his absence. He should have been equally frank and told the House that the debate raged around his letter for four hours, and for at least three hours of the time he was in his seat and not a word was heard from him; neither does he intimate that any bad results followed his lunch. Let me quote from his speech. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, while I was absent yesterday at lunch a letter was read which I wrote. I am wholly responsible for every word that is in that letter and it expresses my views exactly, and I do not regret having written it. The only thing I do regret is that there are some Members of this House so narrow-minded as to get the idea that the President of the United States, or any of his subordinates, had anything whatever to do with the writing of that letter.

That kind of talk may satisfy people who are unacquainted with the ways of the average Republican politician from Missouri. If there is anything in politics they will not attempt, that particular thing has not been brought to their notice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every Member of this House holds a position equal in honor, dignity, and trust to that of any other officer of this Government, and, thank God, it has not yet become a crime for a Member of this House to express his views on this floor concerning the manner of conducting the business of any other department of the Government, or the man who fills the place.

My colleague avows responsibility for the letter. Who expected him to do otherwise? But will he tell us how it is that these letters were scattered over the State—not all written by the gentleman from the fourteenth district? They even permeated the State of Nebraska and, we might presume, other States. That my colleague actually wrote the letter none will deny. That he furnished the brains and mapped out the plan no one acquainted with the facts will believe. The letter proves the hypocrisy of the cry of a nonpartisan census that we have heard in season and out of season. The determination to have a nonpartisan census cost the late Director of the Census his job. No; a nonpartisan, nonpolitical census is not and has not been contemplated by the managers of the Republican party. Your promises to that end, when compared to your conduct, remind me forcibly of the cold-storage egg—grows worse with age. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Go ahead and take the census just as you please, but out of consideration for the truth and in the interest of fair play and political honesty stop shouting at the top of your voices that it is to be nonpolitical, when all of the supervisors, whenever a competent one could be found, are Republican. Be politically honest with yourselves once and see how you feel.

I say here and now that the gentleman's letter was the deliberate result of a scheme concocted by the leaders of the Republican party in Missouri, a bold, impudent attempt to make a poll of the voters of that and other States for the benefit of the Republican party at the expense of the people. If this is a reflection upon, or an insinuation against, private citizens or officials within or without the State of Missouri, I am alone responsible for the statement.

I have before said, in this connection, and I now repeat, that if the Secretary of Commerce and Labor over his own signature will inform this House that nothing of the kind suggested in the letter will be permitted by the census enumerators, we on this side will accept it. But until that information is forthcoming we shall draw our own conclusions from your conduct and act accordingly. The evidence is in your possession; bring it forth, or your failure to do so will be taken by the people to be a confession of your purpose not to have a fair nonpartisan census. Your voice is the voice of Jacob, but your hand is not the hand of Esau. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Again he said: "Another shining example of Democratic fairness can be seen in one county in my State, which is strongly Democratic. One township of that county had, it was estimated, 2,000 persons living in it, and yet a vote was cast of more than 1,500. The Democratic chairman was asked how he accounted for that. He said, 'Why, we always vote the name of every man, living or dead, who has ever lived in this township within the last forty years, and to make it good measure we vote his horses and his dogs' names sometimes.'" Applause on the Republican side greeted this slander. The statement, if true, is an indictment of every election officer in the State of Missouri. No State in this Union has a more fair, impartial, nonpolitical, and nonpartisan election law than has the imperial Commonwealth of Missouri.

My colleague was so indefinite as to time, I have no doubt that he referred to that period in the history of the State from 1865 to 1870, when the Republican party had full possession and complete control of every department of the state government, when the elections were held with every member of the election board a bitter partisan Republican; when ballot boxes were burned and every crime that could be conceived against the ballot was committed with impunity and without fear of punishment, but that time has passed never to return. Had the gentleman used the word "Republican" in place of "Democrat," it would have been a correct description of the time to which I allude, and let me say to my colleague that that is a period in the history of our State to which decent men are loath to refer and no honest man will defend. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Like the snowflake in the river, it is gone forever.

I beg the indulgence of the committee while I give a short synopsis of the election laws of the State:

First. The county court of each county is composed of three citizens elected by the people. Among other duties, these three judges are charged with the duty of appointing election officers. Six judges and four clerks compose the election board in every precinct in the State. Three judges must be taken from each of the two parties casting the largest vote at the last prior election, and these three judges are recommended by, and must be appointed from lists furnished by, the chairmen of the political parties entitled to the judges. In addition to these judges, each party is entitled to two clerks, to be chosen by the election judges thus appointed. Then, to make more sure that the election shall be fair and honest, each party that has a ticket in the field may appoint a watcher, who can be present and see every vote cast and counted. The law further provides that the tickets shall be printed at the expense of the several counties, each party ticket on a separate ballot. When a voter enters the polling place he is given one of each ticket printed, by one of the judges known as "distributing judges," two judges acting in this capacity, one from each party. He takes all of the tickets, retires to the booth, selects the ticket he desires to vote, delivers the ticket to one of the two receiving judges, who numbers and deposits it in the ballot box, announcing the name of the voter and number of the ballot so it can be heard by the entire board, and two of the clerks record his name. The voter then hands the remaining ballots that have been given him to the other receiving judge, who places them in a box prepared for that purpose. If a voter enters the polling place who can not for any reason make out the ticket he desires to vote, he informs the distributing judges of that fact; announces the party ticket he desires to vote; states the changes, if any, he desires to have made, and one of these two judges must make out the ticket as requested. No suggestion can be made to the voter, and should either of the judges offer a suggestion as to how he should vote he would be guilty of a serious offense under the law.

But the law does not stop here. It requires that the initial letters of the names of the distributing judges shall be indorsed on every ballot delivered to the voter. A ballot without these initial letters will not be counted. When the ballots are counted they are securely sealed up and, by one of the election officers, delivered to the country clerk, who keeps them in his office for one year, at the end of which time they are destroyed. No one is allowed to inspect the ballots, under a severe penalty, unless it becomes necessary in an election contest.

If a fairer election law can be drawn, I submit to you that the people of Missouri would gladly adopt it.

The gentleman charges a serious crime against every election officer in each of the 114 counties of the State. The fraud he charges could not have been committed without the active aid of every member of the election board. About 10,000 citizens of the State act in this capacity at each election, one-half of whom are members of his own party. In justice to himself and the people of the other 113 counties, he should have named the county and township, the time the fraud was perpetrated, and the name of the man making the statement. I want to say for the people of the State, regardless of party ties and party affiliations, that they will not tolerate any violation of the election laws, and woe to the offender, whoever he may be, when his sin has found him out.

I now challenge the gentleman to name the township, county, the date of the election, and the name of the man who made the declaration. Nay, more, in the name of all the people of the State of Missouri, I demand that he give the name as publicly as he made the charge, or in this presence confess the statement was not true. He must do this or stand before his people a self-confessed traducer of their honesty and integrity.

My colleague, evidently as an excuse for writing the letter and having been caught, tells us he comes from a district that was purposely gerrymandered by the Democrats to make it everlastingly and forever Democratic, and then he informs us that northern people have settled it in such numbers that the hopes of the Democrats are forever blasted; that the district is now and will remain Republican, notwithstanding the gerrymander. He complains about the gerrymander of Missouri congressional districts. To gratify my friend and tickle his fancy, I want to admit that the fourteenth district has the appearance of having been fearfully and wonderfully made. In this connection, just in order that a fair comparison may be made, let me call my friend's attention to a few examples in some of the Republican States. I must say that they were constructed by experts who probably were coached by Republican politicians from Missouri, who are also noted experts in the art of letter writing when nonpartisan work is to be done.

Look at the eighteenth Illinois district, so ably represented by the Speaker of this House; for length and width I solemly aver in the language of the poet, "she's a daisy." Republican majority about 8,000.

The twenty-fourth Illinois district is so crooked and humpbacked that a sober Republican politician never attempts to go over it in the daytime without a guide, and it has to be twice numbered on the map so it may be traced. It is also reliably Republican.

The fifteenth Illinois must not be neglected. For shape and symmetry it at once attracts attention. In fact, it is a work of art. At one point the corners of two counties are so close that I am informed that two farm wagons can not pass, and a look at the map, to which I call your attention, convinces me of the truth of the assertion. Overwhelmingly Republican.

Now, let us drop in on the twenty-first Pennsylvania. Behold it in all its gorgeousness. Nothing like it for shape has ever been discovered. It is reported that when the legislature constructed the districts of that State they had enough left over for another district, so they named it "twenty first" and joined it together without regard to shape, size, or previous condition of political servitude. Do not forget, however, that it is reliably Republican. At one place a farmer has shut out travel across it by merely putting up an ordinary farm gate. Look at the map and be convinced.

Take the State of Kansas. The Republicans have so perfectly adjusted district lines that a Democratic vote of 161,209 is denied representation on this floor, while 197,216 Republican voters have eight Representatives. However, we console ourselves with the thought that we have one simon-pure insurgent and one other that shows signs of repentance; at least has spells that indicate it. To be more explicit and to show more clearly just how fair the gentleman's party in Kansas is, I will say that the total vote cast against the Republican party in 1908 was 178,963 and no representation in this House.

Do not pass the State of Iowa. If you do, in the language of the showman, you will miss a good thing. Mr. Taft received at the last election in that State 275,210 votes and Mr. Bryan 206,358 votes, with one lone Representative in Congress. Or if we take all the votes cast against the Republican party in Iowa in 1908 we find a total of 285,157, a clear majority anti-Republican of 9,947, with one Representative out of a total of 11. It is a beautiful map, do not miss it.

I entreat my colleague to look for a moment on the twelfth Michigan. It is certainly a thing of beauty, if not a joy forever. Safely Republican.

See also the fourteenth Massachusetts. It has remarkable architectural proportions, and can not be termed just a happen-so. We must conclude that it was built with malice aforethought, with no other purpose in view than making it Republican for "all time."

The map of the State of Ohio furnishes so many works of art that comparisons would be odious. So I call attention to the entire lot.

My colleague objects very strenuously to the length of his district, and in order that he may not weep alone on that feature of the subject, let me call his attention to the map of Vermont. I solemnly aver that for length alone the fourteenth Missouri district is not in it.

Of course some beautiful examples of the district builders' art may be found in States where no Republicans abound, where the census officials could not find a member of that party with sufficient intelligence to supervise the taking of a purely nonpartisan census, and we hear no complaint from anyone in relation to them.

There is another feature of the remarks of my colleague that deserves attention. That is that the fourteenth district will always remain Republican. If he will examine the record of the last election he will very readily discover that there is an anti-Republican majority in his district of 1,872 votes. Do not forget that we Democrats in Missouri have grown desperately tired of family rows and have concluded to turn over a new leaf by turning down the party of monopoly and greed and show the country what we can do when we try. I do not wish to cause any unnecessary pain or uneasiness to our friends on the other side of the aisle, but as sure as grass grows and water runs the next congressional delegation from Missouri will be 15 Democrats and 1 Republican with a narrow margin. No bribes in the shape of promised tariff protection or special privilege will again seduce the people of any of the districts of the State of Missouri, no matter by whom they are offered.

Since the passage of the Payne-Aldrich revenue-deficit producer, two congressional districts have held elections. That measure and the policy and practices of the Republican party were the issue, and in both instances a majority of the people voted against them. In the sixth district of Illinois a majority of 15,447 in November, 1908, was turned into an adverse majority of 137 in November, 1909. That is to say, a Republican was elected by a plurality only, as against a former majority of 15,447.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the election of February 1 in the sixth district of Missouri. The district comprises seven counties, purely agricultural. The largest city in it has a population of not over 6,500. Two issues only were presented to the people for their decision—the tariff and Cannonism. The issues were sharply defined. Both sides were ably represented. All the argument that could be brought to bear was forthcoming, and Cabinet ministers, governors, ex-governors, Senators and Members of Congress joined in debate. The result clearly indicates the drift of public sentiment in the great Middle West. The Payne tariff bill and the Republican administration were on trial before a strictly farming constituency, and were overwhelmingly crushed and beaten. A Democratic majority of 1,893 in November, 1908, was increased to 3,778—a striking example of what Missouri Democrats can do when they take a notion to pull together and work in harmony. For the first time since 1870 we have a Republican governor, and, my word for it, there will not be another for the next century.

A little of that thing goes a long distance with people who are used to better things.

In conclusion, I now say to my colleague, if he will give the name of the precinct and county in which the alleged fraud was perpetrated, I will personally bring it to the attention of the prosecuting officers of the county, and I assure this House that whatever may be the political affiliation of the officers, the offenders will speedily be brought to justice, and this includes the judges of the election, for the fraud could not be committed without the connivance and active aid of the election officers. Will my colleague give the information? [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, on the 21st day of February, 1910, Senator ALDRICH, the leader of the Republican party on the floor of the United States Senate, said:

If I were a business man, and could be permitted to do it, I would undertake to run this Government for $300,000,000 a year less than it is run for.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a plea of guilty to the charge of extravagance and incompetency which the Democratic party has preferred against the Republican party in the last three national campaigns. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a fair and frank admission that $300,000,000 a year, an enormous sum of the people's money, is wasted by the reckless management of the party in power; that appropriations exceed the needed amounts for the Government by this great sum; that the party in power annually appropriates this amount more than it ought to. In other words, 30 per cent of all the appropriations is absolutely thrown away. This sum is equivalent to three and one-third dollars for every individual, large and small, old and young, in the Republic.

The appropriations of the Sixtieth Congress, by their enormity, shocked the public and angered the people. At the last session of that Congress there was appropriated to defray the annual operating expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1910, the enormous sum of $1,044,014,298.23. This is a sum equal to $12.50 for every person in the Republic, a sum which is more than equal to $1 per minute for every minute of time which has elapsed since Christ was born up to the present hour, $1 for every minute of time of the one thousand nine hundred and ten years constituting the entire Christian era. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is already known that this year's appropriations will exceed that of any former year in the history of the Government. How large no one can tell until the labors of this session are ended. No other nation on earth is so expensive. If the state and municipal governments in this country were equally as expensive the people could not maintain the burden of sustaining them and would not tolerate them to exist. This evil of extravagance is growing, and the Republican party has clearly demonstrated that it is powerless to stop or curb it. It is committed to the policy of extravagance, and all efforts upon its part to control it are futile.

True, its leaders preach economy, but by their votes here in this House practice and encourage extravagance. It can not change the policy to which it has been so long committed, and all attempts upon its part are in vain. One of the reasons alleged by leading Republicans for its inability to economize in public expenditures is that the methods employed in the public offices are antequated, and it is impossible to get the officials in them to adopt up-to-date methods, so that economy and better results would ensue and more efficient service be rendered. It is, in my judgment, the best argument that could be made for a change of the party in power in order that new methods and up-to-date officials should be installed. It is asserted that these offices are conducted as they were forty years ago, and the system of that period is the one used now. This only strengthens the charge that the departments are behind the times and new men should be put in charge, who would inaugurate new methods to improve and facilitate the public service, save the large amounts now wasted, and produce better results for the people. "A public office is a public trust," and should be administered for the public benefit, but under Republican rule a public office is treated as if it were a private sinecure.

The bill under consideration is to appropriate money for the Post-Office Department for the coming fiscal year. The amount proposed to be appropriated by it is, in round numbers, $240,000,000, an enormous sum, an increase over last year's appropriation for this department of $5,119,825. It was confessed that the amount appropriated last year was extravagant, a sum much larger than was needed, if properly managed; but instead of reducing the amount for the coming year it is increased. It is a notorious fact that this department of the government service is run at a loss instead of at a profit; that it costs more to run it than it earns, and yet it is a business department and ought not only to be self-sustaining, but earn a large surplus for the Government every year. Other businesses similar in character do so, and if this department was conducted upon a business basis and run in a business manner it would do so. The various express companies do a competing business with it and earn, as the public well knows, enormous dividends for their stockholders.

The President in his annual message informs the country that it costs the Government 9 cents per pound to transport second-class mail matter, such as newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, and this produces a deficit, yet it is a well-known fact that express companies carrying such freight for 2½ cents per pound are able to declare enormous dividends on their capital stock. If express companies can do this, why can not the Government? The difference is that the former is conducted on a business basis and the latter as a political machine operated to keep the Republican party in power and ignores the application of business principles in its management.

To adopt the President's recommendation in this matter would be adding additional tax on intelligence, as it would increase the price of newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, which the reader would have to pay. In other words, it would tend to diminish their circulation by increasing their cost. For one I am opposed to the proposed increase and shall vote against it. Knowledge should circulate freely and cheaply, in order that the standard of intelligence of the people from year to year may improve.

By applying strict business methods to this department and less political manipulation the deficit can be overcome and the necessity for raising the cost of postage avoided. This Government is paying the railroads too much for carrying the mails, a sum far in excess of what it should pay, and a much larger sum than a business institution would pay for similar service, and this is the cause of the deficit in this department.

For the last seven years the Government has paid, as the records show, the following amounts for this service, including which this bill carries an appropriation for the coming fiscal year:

1905	$39,698,000
1906	40,900,000
1907	43,000,000
1908	44,660,000
1909	45,250,000
1910	46,568,000
1911	46,620,000
Total	306,696,000

This enormous amount is paid by the Government to the railroads alone for carrying the mail, a sum much larger, yes, more than double, than the amount the express companies pay for carrying a similar amount of like matter. This could be reduced in the interest of economy and in the interest of the promotion of the general welfare of the people.

But another and more serious complaint can be justly made against the business methods of this department in the rental of post-office cars from the various railroads of the country. In addition to paying the railroads for carrying the mails, there has been paid by the Post-Office Department for the rental of such cars in—and it is proposed by this bill for the coming fiscal year to pay them the sum of $5,047,000 as rental for such post-office cars. For these cars the entire cost of construction and equipment does not exceed $7,000 each, and this sum makes the rental paid on each car per year used $3,575.10.

The average lifetime of these cars, as shown by experience in the service, is ten years. One of them therefore earns for the railroad company during its time of service $35,751, and the companies are paid that amount for its use as rental by the Government. A most splendid investment; more than 50 per cent profit per year. Such methods are sufficient to wreck any business institution. Such reckless extravagance and utter disregard of public welfare demands rebuke. [Applause.]

Is there surprise that the Post-Office Department is not self-sustaining under such business methods? Would it not be better to practice economy and practical business sense in this branch of the service by reducing these enormous charges to a reasonable basis, instead of increasing the rates on second-class postal matter? Here is an example of extravagance and waste which should be corrected. It is said that nearly everything in the Post-Office Department is controlled by executive order. If this be true, then there should be a timely executive order made which would cancel these contracts and direct new ones, which would be in keeping with good, sound business principles and common justice to the American people.

If the business of this department is under executive orders, as claimed, another matter at this time might be suggested with propriety which would relieve this department of much work and save much time, which could be profitably employed by the Postmaster-General in looking after the business of his office, and also relieve the President of much embarrassment and work, and that is an order that all postmasters hereafter at the national presidential election be selected by a vote of the patrons of the several post-offices of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such an order would be approved by the people and hailed as a much-needed reform in this country. [Applause.] There is no good reason why the people of this country should not be permitted to select their postmasters by ballot, say who they want to hold the office and handle their mail. They are better qualified to select them than some man a thousand miles away, who is not acquainted with either the applicant or the patrons. But to do this would weaken the great political machine which is operated in behalf of the party in power. This is a reform coming at no distant day, and its advent will encourage all believers in good local self-government. [Applause.] It would have a great tendency to purify the department service, reduce the expense of operating the office, and lighten the duties now performed in that department.

The amount paid by the Government to the railroads in another branch of the service is a flagrant example of official extravagance and mismanagement which demands the attention of the country at this time. In the last eleven years the Government has paid for transporting the army and its supplies enormous sums in proportion to the number of enlisted men and the amount paid them for service. I submit for consideration the following authentic statement from the records:

Year.	Number of enlisted men.	Pay of same.	Transportation of army and supplies.
1899	95,426	$4,961,172.00	$61,301,474.98
1900	94,940	14,225,000.00	26,000,395.97
1901	81,235	16,020,846.00	29,900,000.00
1902	59,866	15,000,000.00	34,000,000.00
1903	55,500	12,462,492.00	25,189,415.00
1904	65,940	10,000,000.00	15,625,583.02
1905	63,022	10,288,650.00	15,062,471.61
1906	63,402	10,500,000.00	12,042,279.19
1907	55,108	9,956,570.25	12,651,560.16
1908	77,457	11,178,504.00	17,159,091.44
1909	80,897	11,206,000.00	11,250,000.00
Total		125,799,234.25	280,186,271.37

More than twice as much, as the records show, was paid the railroads for transportation of the enlisted men and their supplies than was paid the men for their services. The men who put their lives in jeopardy, the men who carried the musket and faced the enemy, the men who stood ready and willing for battle, did not receive one-half as much for their patriotic service as did the railroads for carrying them and their supplies during the above period of time. An unreasonable proposition, but nevertheless true. Economy in this matter could be used to good advantage, and very profitably so, without crippling the service.

What is true of the army in this respect is true of the naval department, and I here submit a statement from the records for the last twelve years:

Naval establishment.

Year.	Strength.	Pay of navy.	Total appropriation.
1899	13,750	$9,125,460.00	$148,395,525.27
1900	20,000	13,500,171.00	54,548,798.96
1901	20,000	12,810,000.00	70,623,717.99
1902	20,050	15,200,284.00	82,477,649.78
1903	28,000	16,138,199.00	85,137,123.93
1904	31,000	17,706,099.00	84,672,048.73
1905	34,000	19,324,093.00	103,633,115.40
1906	37,000	17,500,000.00	115,420,997.75
1907	37,000	20,269,637.00	104,508,719.83
1908	38,500	21,000,000.00	99,693,208.32
1909	44,500	30,979,225.00	129,974,371.95
1910	44,500	32,803,486.72	139,216,545.02
Total		226,356,654.72	1,218,303,092.93

The total cost of maintenance of the naval establishment from 1899 to 1910, inclusive, has been $1,218,303,092.93.

There can be no doubt of extravagance in this department. Five times as much has been appropriated to maintain the navy as there was to pay the officers and men engaged in the naval service during the last twelve years.

This condition requires public attention, and demands reformation. In the last three national campaigns it is a notorious fact that the railroads were very active in behalf of the Republican party. Their officers employed coercive methods to make their employees vote the Republican ticket by stating that if the Republican party was not successful they would not be able to continue in business. Sir, whether or not this liberal patronage of the Government was the cause of such highhanded coercion I do not know, but I do know it was a strong inducement for such coercive conduct. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, sir, extravagance does not exist alone in the three departments mentioned, but has invaded and exists in every department of the National Government. Congress about three years ago appointed a commission to investigate the subject of foreign immigration to this country. It traveled nearly all over the world on a junket at the expense of the Government, and has cost the people of this country $657,000 and has not reported yet the result of its work, only its expense, and has had $125,000 more appropriated to complete its work, thereby entailing a total cost of $782,000 on the people. It was useless to create such a commission, because men could have been taken out of the Commerce and Labor Department of the Government, trained in this branch of work, who could and would have performed this work more satisfactorily for less than one-tenth of what it has cost, and would have reported before this time the result of their work to the public.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, there have been appropriated for the use of the President the following:

President's salary	$75,000
Vehicles, stables, etc	35,000
President's traveling expenses	25,000
Contingent fund	25,000
Improvements to the White House	40,000
Furnishings and draperies	15,000
Secretaries and clerks	69,920
For care of grounds	5,000
Lighting White House grounds	19,500
Fuel for White House and stables	6,000
Repairs of greenhouse	3,000
Care of greenhouse	9,000
Printing	2,000
Total	329,420

An enormous sum, more than ever was appropriated for any Executive of this Nation for the same period of time. How can the President expect economy in other departments of the service when there is such an increase of expenditure in his own department? There was a raise in his salary from $50,000 to $75,000 per year; traveling expenses appropriated of $25,000; and for automobiles $25,000—at least $75,000 per year more than it should have been.

Again, former Vice-Presidents were paid $8,000 per year; the present occupant of that high office is paid $12,000 per year, and, in addition, is given $6,000 for an automobile. The Speaker formerly received $8,000 per year, but his salary was raised to $12,000 per year, and he was donated $6,000 for an automobile. What right has Congress to appropriate money to buy automobiles for public officials? The Cabinet officers were formerly paid a salary of $8,000 per year, but under this administration they are paid $12,000 per year. Sir, the party in power is liberal in its increases of salaries for its high officials. The Republican party has in the last seven years created 100,000 new federal offices, at an annual expense of $80,000,000 to the American people.

It is not an opportune time to increase salaries and raise taxation. There is a deficit now of $100,000,000 in the National Treasury, and the new revenue law—the Payne bill—does not raise sufficient revenue to meet the requirements of the government expenditures, and now, in time of profound peace, the Government, as administered by the Republican party, is borrowing $50,000,000 with which to pay its daily operating expenses. By its inability to check extravagance and establish and conduct a business administration of public affairs, it confesses its incompetency and forfeits its right to a continuance in power.

Mr. Chairman, performance is a better guaranty on any proposition than promise. The party in power talks economy, but votes for extravagance; it promises to lighten the burdens, but increases the load under which the citizens groan; it raises the rate and widens the inequalities of federal taxation; it levies a 10 per cent duty on the diamonds of the rich and 160 per cent on the blankets of the poor; it fixes a high duty on the raiment of the laborer and a low duty on the jewels of the idler. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA].

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Chairman, I shall avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee to present to the House a memorial from the house of delegates of Porto Rico which I received to-day and in which their views are embodied about the bill now pending before the Committee on Insular Affairs, and I ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that privilege under the rule.

The memorial is as follows:

The house of delegates of Porto Rico to the United States Congress:

A message of protest against bill No. 19718, presented before the House of Representatives by the Hon. M. E. OLMSTED, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The house of delegates of Porto Rico feels the imperious necessity of bringing before the notice of the United States Congress an energetic protest, unanimously proclaimed throughout the entire island, against the above-named project, which offends our country's dignity, denies her capacity, and attacks her liberty and indisputable rights to an honorable life within the inviolable coexistence of all American countries.

The regimen created by the Foraker Act is absurd and despotic, installing the higher house by presidential appointment without the intervention of the people, mingling and confusing the legislative and executive powers, and leaving the Porto Ricans without a definite and recognized personality in the law of nations.

Together with these grave errors which could dim in the eyes of the world the light and glory of the great Republic, our political constitution contains other defects, such as the absolute lack of unity in the administration, divided between the governor and six department heads, without any strong hierarchical bond nor cohesion in power cohibiting and weakening by repeated conflicts the uniform direction of public affairs.

In addition to these defects, the present organic law deprives us of the inherent rights of interior government and snatches from native hands all participation in executive power, putting our treasury, public instruction, and other branches of insular administration into the hands of strangers.

The errors contained in the Foraker Act may be classed in three distinct orders: Those which affect the prestige of the American Government in the light of international law; those which concern the efficacy of the American Government in the local administration, and those which wound our people in one of the fundamental aspects of their right to the exercise of power.

The bill presented for consideration before the United States Congress corrects the errors which pertain to the American Government, but as respects the others they still stand, fortified, augmented, and unbearable, in every detail oppressive and odious to the people of Porto Rico.

True, the legislative and executive powers are divided, but neither are in the hands of Porto Ricans. We are allowed a senate of 13 members, 5 by election and 8 by presidential appointment, which actually implies a still smaller minority in the higher house. It is also true that we are granted the right of naturalization as a means of acquiring citizenship, this being an absolute requisite for the filling of public offices and suffrage, thus attaching a shade of mercenariness and concupiscence to the acquisition of citizenship, which should be considered for its sacred purity a national sacrament.

Thus a new absurdity appears in the division of the Porto Ricans into two classes of citizens, one of the United States, the other of Porto Rico; like two castes, one enjoys political rights, the other does not; and while the naturalized citizens of the United States have the exclusive right to public office, the real citizens of Porto Rico remain as strangers in their own land, and notwithstanding their citizenship are deprived of all civic prerogatives.

One by one the Olmsted bill searches out, erases, and restringes in the Foraker Act all those precepts which conferred a small participation in the insular affairs upon the natives of the island; it goes still further, penetrating into our local statutes and depriving us of all our rights so patiently obtained by incessant effort for the past ten years, during which time native capacity, striking against our hard regimen, like the iron against the stone, produced a few sparks of liberty.

The franchises belong to the legislative branch of the federal system, yet the Foraker Act, while not recognizing the right, confides the concession of all franchises or privileges of a public character to the executive council, thus permitting the intervention of the Porto Ricans numbered among its members; the Olmsted bill confers this delicate faculty upon five department heads, who have not been Porto Ricans under our present regimen and will not be probably under the new one, thus eliminating from the legislature a legislative matter and depriving the Porto Ricans of their legitimate intervention in the distribution of benefits which properly belong to the people of Porto Rico.

It was doubtful, owing to the terms employed in the Foraker Act, whether or not the executive council was qualified to determine the salaries of the functionaries and employees not fixed by the President and to authorize the payment of salaries without the consent of the House of Representatives, and the council never dared do it; the fixing of salaries was always submitted to the house of delegates to be included in the general budget; yet bill No. 19718, now before the United States Congress for consideration, invests the senate, upon the approbation of the governor, with the total, indisputable right of determining alone, without the aid of the house of delegates elected by the people, the personal expenses of the administration, which form a very important part of the general appropriations which the people have to pay without having the right to fix the limit of their own expenditures.

If to this be added the fact that the general appropriations bill is not presented to the house of representatives by one of its members, but by the governor, who may, in case the bill should fail to be approved by the legislature, formulate, distribute, and order payment of any and every item pertaining to the public treasury according to his own pleasure so long as the sum total of the expenses does not exceed that of the preceding bill, it results, both clear and terrible, that the people of Porto Rico would be obliged to pay, but not allowed to vote, the public appropriations, thus being obliged to drag out a miserable existence under the tragic oppression of a tyranny so frightful as to be without a precedent in America.

During the ten years of continuous sufferings and untiring perseverence we had somewhat relieved the hard conditions of the regimen; we obtained an executive department with a Porto Rican functionary at its head; we constituted autonomically our municipalities; we placed in the hands of the people the election of the municipal judges and the secretaries and marshals of the district courts; we secured thus by constant struggle a little light and liberty in spite of the dense black shadow of our political constitution, which hung so closely over us. All this effort, all this anguish gave birth to a pale reflection of happiness and triumph which were ours, the fruit of our sorrows and struggles, and all this is thrown to the ground under the cruel blow which this bill directs against the life and hopes of the Porto Rican people.

A cruel project this, which extinguishes the department directed by an insular functionary, restringes electoral suffrage, destroys the municipal autonomy in matters of transcendental importance, and deprives the people of the right to choose their own judges and magistrates.

We are deprived of what our local statutes concede us, of the benefits which the Foraker Act grant us; and what is inconceivable, we are deprived of that which is outside of all law, but which dwells in every human heart, the love of a people for its leaders, and the right of those leaders to the only honor in the hands of the people to give, that of designating them as members of their house of representatives.

All this would be realized should Congress approve the division of the island into numerous election districts and exact a personal residence of the nominees in these districts, for our legislature would be deprived of its most influential members, those who for their mental capacity and business knowledge are better qualified to direct their country's affairs and to defend her dignity and honor, for nearly all our men of prominence reside either in San Juan or other important cities of the island.

This is what the Olmsted bill pretends and against which we all protest, with due respect to the United States Congress and with all the energy which the rights of our people require of us.

We still hope, and sustained by that hope we ask for that which should be ours by natural right, by the rights proclaimed by history and moral law, a democratic constitution, which should grant to our people, well capacitated for the same, the ample and complete direction of their own affairs without detracting in any way from the high prerogatives of the Federal Government.

We received as allies the American Army in days of conflagration and danger; we have been faithful during a long period of bitter trial; we love and admire the glory and grandeur of the United States, and for that same grandeur and glory we ask them to preserve our admiration, our love, our fealty, and that they swell with the debt of gratitude the stream of noble sentiments and apart from our hearts this sorrow and desperation which are almost madness.

HOUSE OF DELEGATES OF PORTO RICO,
February 23, 1910.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of a message to the Congress of the United States unanimously adopted at a meeting held on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

JOSÉ MUÑOS RIVERA,
Secretary House of Delegates of Porto Rico.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I believe only eighteen minutes remain of the time for general debate, and I desire to yield of that time ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] and the remainder to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and I would ask the Chair to recognize the gentlemen in that order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, the rural letter carriers have preferred a request for a moderate increase in their compensation. This request is a reasonable one, and should be allowed. The rural carrier service in many respects is a hard one. It is a service in the field. It is a service of exposure, of hardship, a service that tries the mettle of a man, and reveals the stuff of which he is made. It is not a place for a weakling, or a shirker. Day in, and day out, with monotonous and unvarying regularity, without regard to wind or weather, in storm and in sunshine, these poorly paid agents of this great Government deliver to the farmers of the country their daily portion of mail.

It is often said that the Post-Office Department comes closer to the people than any other governmental department. Doubtless this is true. But the farmers never came into a realizing sense of this fact, until the establishment of the rural delivery system. For the first time a farmer, not immediately at a post-office on some railroad, found himself justified in taking a daily paper—instead of the weekly or triweekly edition, which generally arrived three or four days late, containing news, a week, or more old. For the first time such a farmer could answer an important business letter on the day of its receipt, with assurance of immediate dispatch.

The few trial carriers with whom the department inaugurated the experiment in Rural Delivery Service, have become a mighty army, but the growth of the service has not been marked by an adequate increase of compensation. This increase in compensation is entirely justified by changed conditions in the cost of living. The enormous advance in this respect which is a direct consequence of the policies of the Republican party, lays its heavy hand on every employee, whether of the Government, of the individual, or of the public-service corporation, who draws a fixed salary.

Organized labor in every section of the United States is making its protest in the form of strikes against present conditions. The employees of the Government can not strike, and in addition are hindered by departmental regulations from presenting in effective form, their case for an increase of compensation. But the facts are before this body, and with knowledge of the facts, we ought to do justice. The average employee is affected by the advance in the cost of living in so far as it increases his domestic expenses, but the rural carrier is affected by this advance in a twofold capacity.

It increases all of his purely domestic expenses, and in addition, it increases the prime cost, and the cost of maintenance, of his outfit. If the Government furnished and maintained this outfit, the claim of the rural carrier for increased compensation would be the claim of the average department employee, but such is not the case. His equity is much greater, his request much more compelling. A brief statement of the facts in this connection, will be serviceable: "The Government provides nothing for the equipment of a rural carrier, and the statements of the carriers, show that they are required to make an average initial outlay which at present prices, amounts to at least $400. The monthly expense incurred for the maintenance of this outfit, amounts to about 50 per cent of the carrier's earnings."

At present the maximum salary of the rural carrier is about $900 per year for routes 24 miles or more in length—with reductions on 2-mile gradations for routes of less length. The carriers are required to cover their routes daily on schedule time, regardless of the weather, or other hindering conditions.

In view of the many hardships to which the carriers are exposed: the great and increasing cost of maintaining their equipment, and the wonderful and increasing benefits of the service, the carriers make out a strong and reasonable case for an increase of compensation. But the carriers do not ask for the average cost of equipment maintenance.

They merely ask for $90 a month for standard 24-mile routes, with an increase of $2.50 per month for each additional mile, and a reduction of a like amount for every mile below that standard; major fractions of a mile to be treated as a full mile." This advance in compensation, having in mind the increased cost of living will render the compensation for a 24-mile route, the substantial equivalent of what $900 a year meant a decade ago to an official in this service.

In this connection, I reproduce the following interesting and instructive expense accounts kept by a few carriers in my own district, for the six months ending December 31, 1909. These accounts are accurately kept, and may be taken as fairly and fully representative:

It will be seen from these statements that the net earnings of these carriers, which represent the sum out of which they must live and support their families, feed, clothe, and educate them, amount to about $380 a year. The following table gives the net earnings for six months of the carriers throughout the country, as well as the average per month:

Statement showing the average net earnings of rural letter carriers after providing and maintaining the equipment necessary for the performance of their duties for six months ending December 31, 1909. In further connection with this matter, Mr. Chairman, I wish to reproduce some letters from the carriers, giving in succinct form the details of actual experience under present conditions.

———, IOWA, January 19, 1910.

W. D. BROWN,

DEAR BROTHER: I am inclosing my report to you to-day. My corn and hay I bought in a bunch, so I just give an average per month.

Hay I got for $8.50 per ton, now it is worth from $13 to $18 per ton, that is what I will have to pay for the next I buy.

When my horse died I told some of my patrons I was ready now to resign and quit; they did not want me to, so they went to work and raised $100.15 and gave it to me. This makes me feel as if I owed it to my patrons to hold on a while longer, but if a change does not come soon I will have to quit and go at something else, so I can make a living for my family of four.

I began carrying mail four years last June; would be out of it now if it was not for friends.

If I chewed, smoked, and drank, a little, I don't know where I would be, but I am a teetotaler in this line.

Thanking you for your efforts for the carriers, and wishing you much success in the future, I am,

Fraternally, yours, ——— ———.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY NEWS:

I am glad to note the interest you are taking in this matter for the benefit of the boys in the wagons, and heartily cooperate in and thank you for the effort you are making for us. I think your plan a good one and sincerely hope for its success, for we are greatly in need of it at this time.

I have made the report as nearly correct as I can; partially from estimate, but largely from facts. For instance, depreciations and the like, it is impossible to get at the facts. I could not give the expense by months for most of my stuff I purchase in quantity. I am very sure it is not too high, for I find I have left out items, such as straw for bedding, $5, so that I think it very nearly, or quite, reaches $400 for the year.

I have stated there was no net income. It is a fact; but you may think my family extravagant, so I will give a few items; neither do we spend money foolishly. I have bought a pair of cotton-flannel shirts; I am wearing my shoes the third winter; have not purchased a suit of clothes for best in five years, and a part of the last one was a present. I am not writing this boastingly, nor as a complaint, but that you may be able to see the boys' needs. I know it takes a great sum of money to pay the 40,000 boys.

Again thanking you, I am,

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

EDITOR RURAL FREE DELIVERY NEWS:

My sympathy goes out to every rural carrier in the land. I have been through the mill. Three years is enough for me. I commenced to carry mail on route 1 March 1, 1907, and I am going to quit when I have served three years. I hate to be a quitter, but I can't afford the job any longer. Meat, 25 cents per pound; corn, $1 per bushel; lard 18 cents per pound. If I hire a carpenter, I must pay him $3.50 per day. The doctor charges $2.50 for a visit; a little sick spell in the family means about $50. To have my fireplace fixed I must pay 50 cents per hour. If I hire a negro for common labor, it is $2 per day. There are only three in my family. How the boys live that have five and six in the family I can't see.

Waiting for Congress to do something for us is like looking for gold at the end of the rainbow. The army, navy and Panama Canal, etc., need too much money. Congress seems to go on the principle that anything is good enough for the farmers—else why is it that most city carriers can get $100 per month, with no horses to feed? When a city carrier is mounted, how is it he gets $25 to $30 per month extra for horse feed?

Just so long as the people are willing for army and navy officers to live in luxury, just so long as vast sums are fooled away in Panama and elsewhere; why, just that long will the rural carriers have to patch up old harness with tacks and strings.

After three years' service as a rural carrier, I can not imagine how any young man who wants to do something for himself or family can stay in the service.

I visited one of Uncle Sam's war ships at New Orleans, and when I saw how lavish your Uncle Samuel was with his naval officers and men, I naturally thought of the boys in the rural service, who have a close shave to make both ends meet.

Farewell, boys! I hope to meet you all in a better world, where you will have a better show for comfort than you have here below.

EDITOR RURAL FREE DELIVERY NEWS:

I certainly do appreciate more than I can express the efforts you are making for the betterment of the rural carriers. I would be glad to fill out the blank in the News and forward to you, but I have kept no account of expenses. However, it is costing about 50 cents per day to feed one horse, which would make about $35 per month for feed and repairs for two horses.

I have been in the service seven years and nearly seven months. I have not by several hundred dollars made expenses, and it is growing worse all the time, as the cost of living has doubled since I went into the service. I know some one would say why don't you quit; simply because I went into it on account of my health, and it has improved a great deal. I had been in business for about twenty years, and my health was so bad that I was forced to quit, so there is nothing else that I can do.

I do hope that Congress will do something for us; $100 would help us greatly, but we ought to have $300 at least to live decently.

I have not time to write more, and I am not writing for publication, but for your information. Every word I have written can be substantiated by the best people here.

Thanking you again for your efforts in our behalf and wishing for you abundant success, I am,

Your sincere friend, ——— ———.

W. D. BROWN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: In the News of last month you asked the carriers to send a statement of expenses for six months. I filled out the blank, but made some mistakes, so did not send it, but I know at the present price of oats, hay, shoeing, and wear and depreciation of the property it will amount to about $200 for six months. So you can see where we stand.

I am quite discouraged. We can not ask for more, and they will not give us parcel post so that we can wipe out that awful deficit. That reminds me. How can we expect anything but a deficit when we have to travel from 20 to 30 miles every day to take the mail to our patrons for nothing, while we who live in town are expected to pay 80 cents to $1.50 per year box rent and go to the post-office and get mail? Wonder how much of a deficit the city carriers create. Wonder how many of the inspectors earn their salary.

The carriers do not get wages enough to make a decent living, and are not allowed to engage in other business to help make ends meet. I think there is a temptation to the carriers to be dishonest. Talk about the dignity of the office! Not much dignity when we have to use our clothes and rigs until they fail to pieces, to make ends meet. I would like to wear a uniform and have nice horses and rigs, and have scales to weigh packages, and keep three horses, so I could drive double when the roads are heavy. And I would like to send my sub. oftener, so I would not be all tired out. Can not afford it.

I was at Milwaukee in the hospital twice last summer and had two operations, which took all the money I had saved in the five years I have been carrier. Now, if I should lose a horse I would have to go begging to get another. But we are not allowed to do that, are we?

I am very grateful to you, Editor Brown, for the efforts you are making in our behalf, and may God bless you abundantly.

Yours, truly,

——— ———.

PENSACOLA, FLA., February 9, 1910.

EDITOR RURAL FREE DELIVERY NEWS:

As I have not as yet seen in print the letter I wrote you soon after I was appointed, last July, I suppose same has been destroyed.

However, for fear you might be saving it to fill up space during some dull month, I am writing to ask you to be sure that you do not publish it now, unless you put this one along with it.

I find I can not make a bare living on the small salary paid for my 17-mile route, on which I had over 200 boxes and carried over 7,000 pieces of mail in December; so I have resigned and left.

Hoping the next man can live cheaper—or can he yet hope some day to get more pay?

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

NEW AUGUSTA, IND., January 26, 1910.

Mr. W. D. BROWN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR, FRIEND, AND BROTHER: I have been keeping an itemized account of my expenses for several years and can show what every penny was spent for during that time, and no honest Congressman, Senator, President, Postmaster-General, or any other honest man with a heart can not look me square in the face and tell me I lived too high or spent my money foolishly.

For the year 1908 I came out in the hole to the amount of $10.60, and for the year 1909, after earning quite a little for odd jobs, outside of my salary, I had only $36.40 to lay up for a rainy day or old age. Isn't that encouraging?

When I started carrying the mail four years ago I had a nice bank account started up, but it soon started down. Now, my dear friend, you can use this to help the poor fellows out who still hang on to their routes, if you want to, but for me the chances are nine to one my resignation will be on its way to headquarters before you receive this.

In closing, I wish the boys who hang on like a dog at a root the best of good luck, and you, Mr. Editor, and your paper I wish the same good luck and a grand success.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

GENTLEMEN: My expense account may look excessive, but I would take oath that it is not any less, but probably more.

One carrier that has resigned here lost two horses last year. His report would open some of their eyes to what the carriers have to stand on $75 a month, if he was only here to send it in.

Thanking you for calling my attention to this matter, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

KIND SIRS: In regard to rural carriers resigning, we have had our share, 15 carriers in this county, 3 of them have resigned in the last three months.

This may be rather late, but I hope you may find place for it.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

Mr. Chairman, these letters tell a pathetic story of strenuous endeavor. The facts stated constitute a most effective appeal to the sense of justice of every man on this floor, and no words of elaboration on my part can avail to make this appeal more convincing.

Under pressure of these conditions many carriers are resigning, and others are contemplating resignation, as soon as they can arrange for other employment.

CARRIERS GIVE UP JOBS—SIX IN POTTAWATTAMIE COUNTY OUT BECAUSE OF BAD ROADS AND LOW PAY.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA, February 11.

Something akin to a panic has hit the force of rural mail carriers in Pottawattamie County, six of whom have resigned their places recently, claiming that the bad roads and high cost of living for man and beast renders it impossible for them to live decently upon the $75 a month the Government pays for the service.

Number of changes in the carrier service:

Mr. Chairman, are we treating these officials fairly? In many sections of the country, the railroads, and large corporations are voluntarily increasing the compensation of their employees. In other sections, under pressure of necessity the labor unions are engaged in a fierce struggle to better their condition.

BOSTON "L" INCREASES PAY—RAILROAD COMPANY ANNOUNCES VOLUNTARY RAISE IN WAGES TO EMPLOYEES.

BOSTON, MASS., January 13.

The Boston Elevated Railroad Company to-night announced an increase in wages amounting to upward of $100,000 a year, to go into effect immediately. The advance was not requested by the employees. It is the third voluntary increase of the kind in the last seven years and affects all grades of employees.

GET INCREASE IN WAGES—ADVANCE OF 15 PER CENT OVER OLD SCALE FOR WINDOW-GLASS WORKERS.

PITTSBURG, January 29.

Fifteen per cent advances in the wage scale over the scale signed last July was agreed upon by representatives of the National Window Glass Manufacturers' Association at conference here with a committee of workmen. The advance becomes operative from the time the schedule was signed, and it will affect 1,000 workmen. The manufacturers' committee represented plants from the Kansas gas belt to Pittsburg.

The increase will place the men on a more prosperous basis than they have been for years. The manufacturers' committee was headed by H. N. Hilty, of Port Allegheny, Pa., while J. R. Neeman, of Cleveland, president of the National Glass Workers' Union, conducted the workmen's part in the conference.

INCREASE PAY OF CARMEN—BROOKLYN COMPANY MAKES VOLUNTARY OFFER TO 8,000 EMPLOYEES.

NEW YORK, January 8.

The Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company to-day announced a voluntary increase in the pay of its 8,000 motormen, conductors, and other train men. The increase will be graded according to present pay and length of service, and will cost the company about $200,000 annually.

Mr. Chairman, should this Government admit by its inaction, that the corporations are more ready to do justice, than "Uncle Sam?" Is the case of the carmen, or other wage-earners, more meritorious than that of the rural carriers? Are the conditions of living anywise different?

Does the increased cost of living affect only the employees of private concerns? Is it a fair response to the carriers' request, to say that there is a deficit in the Post-Office Department? The use of the word "deficit," in this connection is misleading. The expense of maintaining this department is one of the fixed and annual charges of government. Unlike the other departments it is largely self-supporting. Hence some portion of the public thinks that it should be entirely so. But this is a mistaken view of the situation. Without regard to its receipts, this department should be adequately supported, and the measure of that support should be the needs of the public service. Does the huge appropriation for the army, and the navy, represent an annual deficit to that extent in that department?

The annual waste in every department of government due to incompetence and mismanagement, is notorious. Recently the President has quoted approvingly the statement that by the application of business methods to the conduct of its business, the Government could save $100,000,000 a year. On the floor of this House a distinguished Member has asserted that the Post-Office Department could afford to pay $100,000 a year to secure the services of a business head, who would apply business methods to the management of its affairs.

This being so, a slight exercise of economy, or a moderate application, on the part of the Republican administration, of essential business principles to the conduct of public affairs, would furnish ample means with which to pay living wages to the employees in the carrier service.

Mr. Chairman, the party in power is responsible for present conditions. Their policies are on trial, and in the carrier service at least, the dinner pails are no longer full. If these policies have made existing salaries inadequate, it is a plain proposition that these salaries should be increased. The Government can not afford to be unjust. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Sixty-first Congress, I introduced in the Sixtieth Congress a bill providing for the improvement of the post-roads of the country. I reintroduced it this session of Congress, and I very much crave the attention of this Congress, and the country as well, to consider the advisability of such legislation.

The question is not a new one, but a very old one instead. During the years from 1806 to 1838 this Government appropriated from the Federal Treasury $7,000,000 for the improvement of highways, and since that they have appropriated nothing.

That the improvement of post-roads, over which the Government carries its mail by government employees, is constitutional I think none will gainsay or deny.

For the benefit of those opponents of this legislation who may for ulterior reasons make the charge of unconstitutionality, I want to refer to a resolution passed by the American Congress on the 14th day of March, 1818. The following is the exact language of the act:

Resolved, That Congress has power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post-roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of waterways.

It is no less interesting that the great Democratic party, in convention assembled in the good year 1908, embodied in their national platform the following language, which I quote with pride and no little esteem:

Post-roads.—We favor federal aid to state and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post-roads.

It is with a keen sense of pride that we read from the document of all documents, the American Constitution, when we find the breadth and depth of character of our forefathers in the formation of that document. How farsighted they were, and how clearly they foresaw what must inevitably come. Article I, section 8, provides in part:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Now, I think it is safe to assume that no fair-minded or thoughtful man will contend that the clause "general welfare" is not abundantly sufficient to cover the improvement of post-roads used by the Government for the transporting of the mail, and traveled over by their very employees, the rural carriers.

But we are not without authorities on the subject of more recent years, and it is interesting to know that this question has not gone without the attention and deep consideration of the best law writers of this age, and so conceded by both lawyer and layman.

Cooley on Constitutional Law, and his worth as a law writer is not a matter of question for either friend or foe, says:

Every road within a State, including railroads, canals, turnpikes, and navigable streams existing or created within a State, becomes a post-road whenever, by the action of the Post-Office Department, provision is made for the transportation of the mails upon or over it.

Other opponents of the measure in years gone by have sought to create a prejudice in our minds against legislation looking to the improvement of the post-roads on the ground of paternalism. This charge has never appealed to me as a serious one, but, on the contrary, a frivolous one. For, as we have observed both in practice and in law, the improvement of the post-roads was a proper one and always in the interest of the State and never to their disadvantage. Further have we seen the Federal Government using the highways for the transportation of the mails by government employees and, at the same breadth, the enjoyment of the same thoroughfare by individuals in their private capacities.

We have the same observation to point to the fact that the roads are used by rich and poor, weak and strong, soldier and civilian, Government and individual, yea, even savage and civilized. Surely the improvement of a medium of such general and universal utilization is not to-day, was not yesterday, and never will be paternalism. For if this be paternalism, let all embrace it together. If this be paternalism, the word no longer possesses a stigma or a sting. For those who would longer make this charge we can but stand and be amazed at them standing alone, threadbare of reason and sound logic.

There is a charge made against the improvement by federal aid of the post-roads of this country that has at first blush more merit than the rest. It is the charge "that it is too gigantic in its proportions"—too much for this Government to undertake. My reply to this charge is but to compare the aid the Government has rendered the three great methods of transportation, viz: First, the railroads; second, the waterways; and third, the common dirt roads or post-roads of the country. I can not resist before entering on a discussion of the three great methods of transportation of the Nation's wealth asserting that the question of transportation is not outdone in greatness with even production itself.

GOVERNMENT AID TO RAILROADS.

This Government has granted 159,125,734 acres of the public domain to the railroads of the country to encourage them in railway building. This acreage, at $10 per acre, would be and amount to an appropriation of $1,591,257,340 of the people's money. This was the granting away of homes for 3,988,143 American families of 40 acres each. This was not for the benefit of all of the people and to remain their own, but was for the direct benefit of the railways, to become their private property, and for the indirect benefit of all of the rest of us.

Now, as there are 40,628 rural routes in the United States of approximately 24 miles each, we have a total rural route or post-road mileage of 975,072. Now, if the amount we have appropriated to railways in government land grants could have been expended on the post-roads of this country in conjunction with the States and municipalities, every post-road in this United States would have received an expenditure of $2,000 per mile and there would be in the Treasury $616,185,340 to extend rural routes and bring happiness, intelligence, and progress to the heart of every citizen who enjoyed its beneficent influences and effects. This comparison must make those who would oppose the improvement of roads cringe in their seats to observe how they have been generous in the past with railways, which are private corporations, and how they are now practicing economy on those who are entitled to liberality and fair treatment. To appropriate for post-roads would not be passing public property into private hands, but placing it at the disposal of all, for the use of all, and the property of all always.

WATERWAYS AND WHAT THE GOVERNMENT HAS DONE FOR THEM.

The Government has aided the waterways of the country from time to time by the appropriation from the Federal Treasury of $610,068,875.78, and this does not include the Panama Canal, which has already cost $210,590,528, and will, in the estimation of the President, cost $397,000,000 when completed. Neither does the first amount named include the appropriation for waterways passed at this very Congress for more than forty-two millions, and passed without even a roll call or record vote.

Now, to those who would oppose this legislation on the ground of impossibility of operation, I want to call your attention to the fact that the amount expended for waterways would improve every post-road under the cooperative plan in the United States and leave a balance on hand of $73,996,875 for the further extension of roads for rural routes, and thereby extend the blessings of government to the plain people, who produce more every year than they themselves consume. This would be a distribution of the blessings of this Government to the producer and the consumer, to the soldier and the civilian—lo, to every citizen of the land irrespective of race, color, or station.

It also may well be observed that if we would appropriate the same amount each year that we have appropriated this year for waterways and there were no other source to draw from we would in less than twenty years have every route improved; and I submit that it would be distributing benefits more widely, would be more lasting in character, and would add more to the beauty, grandeur, and power of the Nation.

Again we may observe that the amount appropriated for the Panama Canal each year for three years would improve every post-road under the cooperative plan and have money left in the Treasury for extension and further improvement of rural routes and post-roads. I assert that it is possible and the part of wisdom, justice, and economy as well.

GOVERNMENT AID FOR POST-OFFICES AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

It is interesting to note that the Government has expended for federal buildings throughout the country more than $150,000,000. Now, answering the charge further of its being too gigantic in character for the Government to undertake, we readily observe that an expenditure of $2,000 per mile under the cooperative plan could be expended on every post-road in the country if this amount be appropriated each year for six and one-half years.

While it is true that we all rejoice to have government buildings in our towns and cities, and while the town that has them or can get them invariably wants to keep them and get them, respectively, still think of the thousands of villages and hamlets that can not expect to have them. Observe, in fairness, how the roads benefit all, while the erection of public buildings in a few cities benefit the cities that have them and do not even indirectly benefit the cities that do not have them. One is general in character, the other special. Both are desirable, but one more desirable by reason of being universal; the other less desirable by reason of being special and not uniform. One is being appropriated for every year, the other being neglected every year—unfair on its face and inequitable as well.

TOO MUCH FOR WAR—TOO LITTLE FOR AGRICULTURE AND PEACE.

The American Congress is appropriating too much for war and too little for peace. The American Congress is appropriating too much for war and too little for agriculture and internal improvements.

The increase in the average appropriations for army and navy for the eight years succeeding the war with Spain over the eight preceding years is $1,072,000,000. This increase for the last eight years would, if you please, expend under the cooperative plan $2,000 on every mile of post-road in the United States and leave in the Treasury for extension more than $97,000,000. The 90,000,000 American people have the right to ask, Would not the latter expenditure on roads benefit all more than the increase in annual appropriations for war or navy? The people have a right to your reply. This eight-year increase exceeds the national debt by $158,000,000.

It exceeds the entire expense of the Government for the whole year of 1910.

It is three times the estimated cost of the Panama Canal.

It is more than the entire irrigation projects planned for the next generation.

It is $60 for every family in the United States. Interest on this increase for the past eight years at 8 per cent would yield $2,000 per year to every family making up a city of 200,000 population.

Our defenses prior to 1898 were adequate, and why not presume that they are adequate now? No war clouds hover around or about us. Why not spend this enormous increase on internal improvements and legislate the hearts of this country closer to the Government by light burdens, rather than drive them away with heavy burdens? Four hundred million dollars annually for war and navy and $10,000,000 for agriculture is all out of proportion and will not operate to cement us together, but will drive us apart. It will unnecessarily tax us beyond our endurance. It will burden us for things we do not need. It will necessitate neglect of things we do need. How wrong it is to appropriate so much for war and so little for industry and peace. One appropriation makes widows and orphans, while one feeds hungry mouths and clothes threadbare limbs.

One is to maim and kill, the other brings peace, progress, and success.

War places homes in ashes. Peace and industry build homes instead of hovels.

One unites families in patriotism and love, the other dissipates and disrupts the home.

One adds to love of country and patriotism, the other to bluster, heartaches, disaster, and want.

I tell you such inequities can not go on without my protest. I tell you, sir, if this extravagance does not cease, my protest will be the protest of the many. [Applause.]

It is interesting to note the result of the industry and thrift of the American producer. Last year the American farmer produced the following crops:

	Total production.
Corn	$1,652,822,000
Hay	689,345,000
Wheat	730,046,000
Cotton	668,861,806
Total	3,741,074,806
	Total exports.
Corn	$25,444,990
Cotton	461,919,568
Wheat	50,576,602
Flour	49,952,779
Total	588,984,475

The amount of products that went abroad last year, bringing back golden treasure and wealth and power to this Nation would in less than two years improve all the roads now used as post-roads. Then this class, who produce more every year than all of us at home can consume, and bring back to this shore treasure aggregating nearly $600,000,000, have the right to expect that some of the beneficent influences of the Federal Treasury may be used on the thoroughfares that make the marketing of their crops possible, the education of their children possible, the habitation of their farms possible, and their profits in proportion to what they earn and what they do, and at government expense.

Good roads are the common milestones marking our civilization.

Good roads, like good deeds, live forever, while bad roads, like bad deeds, retard our progress and success.

Good roads make better profits for the producer, and enable the consumer to buy a better grade of products for less amounts.

Good roads are the pride and joy of the country that have them; it is our duty to act.

I tell you, sir, this is not a single appeal, but it is one common appeal from every citizen in every walk of life. It is an issue that will not down until it is met by aid at the hands of this Government. [Applause.]

HIGH PRICE OF LIVING DUE PARTIALLY TO BAD ROADS.

This country is to-day in turmoil and furor at the enormous cost of living. Its unusual proportions are bringing pangs of hunger to the industrious as well as to the idle. The wages paid the toiler of this land will not feed and clothe himself and the dependent ones. We read of the bread line in the cities, and we read of the strikes in the great centers, and it must tug at the heart strings of every citizen who has a heart to ache. It must wound the pride of every American. No small portion of this is caused by the inability of the farmer to market his crops when there is a demand for them at a reasonable price and forcing him at certain periods of the year to glut the market and destroy prices on account of bad roads, with corresponding scarcity and inflated prices when roads are impassable. For with bad highways and bad roads the producer can not market his products when the markets are active, but when it is possible to get to market with them. Here the farmer gluts the market and destroys the prices at one period of the year and denudes the market at other periods of the year. In the one instance the consumer suffers and in every instance the producer suffers. A losing and a suffering at the hands of bad and impassable highways, that could be easily, sanely, and wisely improved merely by practicing economy in the lavish appropriations for the army and navy for at least four or five years.

The present high prices will and is doing more to disrupt business affairs in the cities now than any other one thing. The wage-earner who received $2 per day when his living cost him $40 per month is still getting $2 per day and his living now costs him $70 per month. In the former case the toiler was able to save $20 per month, whereas now he loses $10 per month. This is a losing deal for the wage-earner, and his dissatisfaction is of necessity immediately aroused. His very existence and hearthstone is at stake. His employer has not become accustomed to the increased cost of living, and the suffering and the trouble and want that is going to result from this increased cost of everything we eat and wear is going to cause more trouble than we know.

BAD ROADS ENABLE MIDDLEMEN TO CORNER MARKETS.

The fact that during a large portion of the year the roads are wholly impassable, thereby denying the producer the opportunity to market when he may market to advantage. It further enables a cornering of the markets and the exacting of exorbitant prices from the consumer without any corresponding advantage to the producer. Here is an injustice that is to-day nation wide in the cotton-gambling evils and the bucket-shop evils that haunt the producer and the consumer by day and by night.

I tell you, sir, it is the solemn duty of this Congress to afford an open and an honest market for the producer to sell and the buyer to buy. It is wrong to let the man who neither produces nor consumes fix the price for the seller and the buyer by reason of lax laws and the neglect in the improvement of the American highways and post-roads.

WE NEED MORE RURAL ROUTES AND BETTER ONES.

I am glad to say that in my judgment the greatest boon to the American farmer is the rural route. Nothing is so near to him and nothing so dear to him. I am in favor of those 40,628 routes that we now have, and am in favor of more of them and better ones as well. The average route is now 24 miles, with unimproved roads. With improved roads we could lengthen them out to 30 miles, thereby dispensing with every fifth carrier; hence one-fifth of the expense eliminated. For it is easily understood and will not be controverted that if a carrier can travel through mud and unbridged streams 24 miles with difficulty, he can on improved roads travel 30 miles with ease. Hence, we see that in a short time the roads would pay for themselves, even if the amounts expended were made reimbursable to the Government. It is not only good for the producer and consumer, but it is economy as well for the Government, who yearly makes appropriations therefor.

IN PROGRESS AND POWER THIS NATION STANDS AT THE HEAD; IN ROAD IMPROVEMENT AT THE FOOT OF ALL NATIONS.

Every heart swells with pride when we point to the sisterhood of States as standing at the very head of all the nations of the earth in power and in greatness. But how it must wound the pride of every true American to admit that with all our zeal, our energy, and ambition we stand at the very bottom when it comes to the improvement of our post-roads. England, France, Germany, Belgium, and all of the civilized nations of the earth have improved their highways, and here we are faltering and waiting and neglecting a duty we owe to the country and to all.

IMPROVE THE ROADS AND DRIVE THE BOYS BACK TO THE FARMS.

One of the greatest dangers that to-day haunt the American people is the universal desire of the American boy to leave the farm and go to the bright lights of the cities and the crowded centers. This mania is not without a reason, and that reason is apparent to us all. With bad roads, the boy or girl living in the rural communities is denied the use of the higher education that goes with the city school and that is impossible in the country schools where the country is sparsely settled. It denies the country boy or girl the churches, the libraries, the theaters, and places of amusements. With improved post-roads and highways this distance will be annihilated, this evil will be remedied, and the farmer's daughter and son, respectively, will share in the benefits that their industry and frugality will richly entitle them to.

These conditions are some of the things that is allowing the farm to grow up in weeds; these are the conditions that make the cost of living so extremely high; these are the evils that will cause this Nation to retrograde if not changed, and it is the duty of this Congress to act.

To improve the highways and allow them the advantages offered by the city will but make their race for the good things in life equal.

I again repeat: Give the farmer's son and daughter a chance to attend the churches, the libraries, the theaters, the colleges, and their frugality, their industry, their freedom from the bad habits, their simplicity, and earnestness of manner will but win for them the success that their efforts, industry, frugality, and intelligence have long entitled them to.

Improve the highways and make farm life more attractive and the congested conditions in the great centers will cease, and the farmer's son will take his back track and again take up his avocation on the farm with a light heart and willing hands. It can but result in good to all. It will increase the scope of employment in the cities and towns. It will increase the Nation's wealth in the products we produce. It will develop the bald prairies of the West and convert plain and forest into a garden of homes, and the world will prosper and improve as the years speed by.

The consumer can live more cheaply and care for wife and baby better. The farmer, with farm under a high state of cultivation, can produce and market more products at a greater profit. The farm, the mine, and the forest can be brought to the door of the factory, and the world will be made brighter and better from every aspect.

Let us not neglect the old homestead until it grows up in the weeds of neglect, brought about by neglect and unfair treatment. Let us not be unmindful of the adage, old but true, "That you may tear down the cities and towns of this Nation and willing hands will rebuild them, but forsake the farm and disaster will ensue." In order that we have cities we must first have farms. In order that we have farms we must have markets. In order to have markets we must have transportation. In order to have transportation we must have roads. All, I tell you, sir, we must have working together and in unison and in accord or this Nation will never reach the zenith of its greatness and power.

RURAL ROUTES WERE SCOFFED AT IN THE BEGINNING.

In 1897, when the American Congress made the first appropriation of $40,000 for aid in the establishment of a rural delivery of the mails, the idea was scoffed at, and it was then by many of the Members of Congress and citizens outside of Congress deemed a wild orgy of speculation—was characterized as a bubble unworthy of solution.

The advocates of the measure were jeered at and complained of and charged with all sorts of paternalism; all sorts of criticism was hurled at them. To-day how changed. None so poor as to do the opponents reverence. To-day this Congress is appropriating $37,500,000 for rural routes, and everyone sanctions the appropriation. No one now says it is paternalism. No one now complains of it as a bubble. No one would repeal it if he could. No one could repeal it if he would.

I tell you, sir, dear as the rural route is to the American farmer, dearer yet to him is the subject of highway improvement. All the countries of the world have acted and become thoroughly committed to it. This question will not end. This question will not down.

Let the rural routes be extended, and also the roads over which the faithful carrier daily travels. Let the daily paper be each night handed to the farmer, with tired muscles and limbs, but with rested brain. Let the mail go to him and to his family, and the education and golden results that it accomplishes flow to him free and untrammeled. It is worth more to us in war, as well as in peace, to have a prosperous, patriotic people, free from excessive taxes from without and more internal improvements from within. This law is for the plain people, who will defend us in time of war, who will love us in times of peace. This service must never be reduced, but rather extended and increased. Carve other appropriations. Yea, carve them all rather than to touch one hair in the head of this appropriation for the producers of this country.

Let the ignorant be educated. Let the weak be made strong. Let equal rights to all and special privileges to none ever be the watchword and the glory of this Nation of nations.

TONNAGE OF FARM PRODUCE MOVED EACH YEAR.

The Department of Commerce and Labor shows by carefully compiled statistics that each year in the United States there is moved 265,000,000 tons of farm produce. They further show us that the average haul is about 9 miles to market, and that the cost of transporting them averages $2 per ton. This, as you will observe, costs the American producer and consumer the sum of $560,000,000 annually to move their crop over the unimproved roads of this country. If the farmer can haul a ton of wheat, oats, corn, cotton, or hay for $2 per ton over muddy roads, he can haul 2 tons over improved roads with ease for the same $2. In this way there would be a saving of $265,000,000 to the producer every year. This saving each year in actual cash would in three and one-half years, under the cooperative plan, improve every post-road in the country now in use. This, as you will observe, does not include the saving to the Government in carrying the mails. This does not include the wear and tear occasioned by bad roads on the teams and vehicles. Why, sir, the saving to the producer, the saving to the Government, the increase in value of property by reason of them, the education they impart to those along the lines will pay for themselves each year, and the charge that they are impossible of solution for a Nation ranking as we do at the head is shameful and is threadbare of all that appeals to well-thinking persons.

The Department of Commerce and Labor advises us that it costs the American farmer 5.11 cents per bushel to haul his wheat the average 9 miles, while it costs but 3.5 cents per bushel to ship wheat from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles. I doubt not if the loss could be all carefully compiled and followed out to the minutest detail, that it would result in a loss to the American people of more than a billion dollars per year, and this would be a loss to each and every individual in the United States of $12.50 per head.

I tell you this is not the appeal of any one citizen or class of citizens, but it is the common appeal of every class from every walk of life. It will not down until it is met. It is not met until these highways are improved. [Applause.]

POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S DEFICIT NOT A REPLY.

The postal deficit concerning which we have heard so much during the Taft administration is not a valid defense to this legislation. It is not a defense at all, for while you are appropriating four hundred million for war and navy, appropriating lavishly for public buildings in every hamlet in the country, appropriating lavishly for the improvement of waterways, many of which are not navigable and never will be; while you are digging Panama canals with locks and dams, you shall not be heard to practice economy on the plain people of this country, who have no lobbies here and will not have any. You shall not grant ship subsidies to steamship lines and give away the public domain to the railroads and then be heard to complain of a deficit that your lavishness and foolish extravagance brought about. I favor economy more rigidly than the rest, but I favor it with the citizen who has no lobby here the same as I favor it for the citizens who maintain lobbies here the year around. I tell you the time is rife that some one take up the cause of the citizen who stands ready to defend us in war and stands ready to feed us in peace. I tell you it is not right to subsidize and aid all but the producer and practice rigid economy on him. Improve the roads and the postal deficit will vanish and disappear. [Applause.]

MORE INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS AND LESS TAXES ARE NEEDED.

We must spend more within and less without. Improve the conditions within and we will have no fears from without. Make the improvements for those who are here to-day secure and make them more secure to those who are to follow us. Money spent on internal improvements, thereby enhancing the wealth of the Nation, insuring peace among ourselves, is the salvation of the Republic. Practicing this, patriotism will ever increase and never wane as the years speed by.

Internal improvements, in which the plain people have a deep and immediate interest rather than a remote one, will do more to keep us a happy, closely united, and contented people than all the subsidies paid to railroads, to mail ships and steamships, to tariff subsidies and high duties laid on the one least able to bear and for the benefit of the class least in need. I tell you, sir, the American people will not sit idly by and be ground down by inequalities and inequities for which you can give no good or adequate answer. I tell you, sir, in a Republic where all are free and equal you shall not trample down the many for the glories of the few.

Four hundred millions for war and navy and not one cent for improvements of highways and post-roads of the country will not satisfy them when they know, and they shall know as long as such injustice and inequality prevails.

I tell you, sir, forty-two millions for waterways this year and not one cent for post-roads will not satisfy them when they know, and the truth will out.

Millions for post-offices and public buildings for a few towns of the country and no assistance for the post-roads and the little towns will not satisfy them, and is wrong as well.

A billion-dollar session of an Aldrich-Cannon Republican Congress and not one cent for post-roads or internal improvements will not satisfy the producers, who sent abroad last year $588,984,475 in products from their toil, zeal, and industry, thereby replenishing our Treasury to the brim.

You have arranged tariff schedules for the manufacturer, so that his riches are greater than he ever anticipated. You have subsidized the railroads with land grants until they have grown corpulent with wealth. You have increased the appropriations for the war and navy until the patience of this citizenship is almost exhausted, and now, when asked to do something for the plain citizen, who produces more every year than he himself consumes, you answer with the word "economy." It is no answer, and you shall not plead it. The masks shall be torn from your hypocritical faces, and the taxpayer shall know the truth.

These comparisons will and should haunt you while you sleep and harass you while you wake. They should stare you in the face until you correct them. Spend more at home and less abroad and patriotism will increase and taxes diminish. [Applause.]

Good roads bring the products of the mine and forest to the factory door.

Good roads bring thrift to the farmer and thrift to the consumer and wealth to the Nation.

Good roads make farm life pleasant and profitable and enhances its usefulness.

Good roads will bring us more rural routes—will bring us better ones and more efficient ones.

They make better homes, happier firesides, more patriotic people.

They distribute the products of the mine, the forest, and the factory.

They are the avenues of progress and the highest and best proof of the intelligence we enjoy.

It does justice to producer and consumer and withholds injustice from all.

They save time, labor, money, and failure. They patronize the railways and the waterways you have appropriated for so lavishly.

Highways, I tell you, sir, are not the property of one man or class of men, but are the property and the interest of everyone, whether he be black or white, educated or uneducated, weak or strong, high or low, savage or civilized. They are the property of us all, and we should all aid in their upbuilding.

The beneficent effects of good roads flow to the city and the hamlet as well as to the farmer. They walk hand in hand in community of interest, and surely it is a picture beautiful to look upon and sound at the core.

Good roads are indispensable to our growth and progress and we must not falter or wait to provide for them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will now read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem allowance of inspectors in the field while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster-General, not to exceed $4 per day, $325,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, allow inspectors per diem while temporarily located at any place on business away from their home, or their designated domicile, for a period not exceeding 20 consecutive days at any one place, and make rules and regulations governing the foregoing provisions relating to per diem: And provided further, That no per diem shall be paid to inspectors receiving annual salaries of $2,000 or more.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I raise the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to offer an amendment; of course the point of order will have to be disposed of first.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill concerning this paragraph. I notice this provision, which I believe is in the existing law, provides that no per diem shall be paid to inspectors receiving an annual salary of $2,000 or more. What is the policy of the department in reference to the per diem of officials who receive salaries of more than $2,000? On page 15 is an item of assistant superintendents in the Salary and Allowance Division, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, who shall in addition have per diem. I simply wish to ask what is the reason for the distinction between these two sets of officials who receive the same salary?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the assistant superintendents referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, and the inspectors who receive more than $2,000 a year, and the inspectors who receive less than $2,000 a year, are paid per diem. I do not think that indicates consistent policy on the part of the department. It has been the practice for years to pay inspectors known as "city inspectors," those who receive $2,000 or more in annual salaries, their actual expenses when traveling, and to pay inspectors who receive less than $2,000 salary a per diem of $4 a day.

Mr. MANN. Well, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I move the following amendment: Strike out the word "four" in line 20, page 2, and insert the word "three," so as to read "$3 per day."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out "four" and insert "three," so as to read "$3 per day."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this $4 per diem can be justly defended. I know that the Post-Office Department insists that it is necessary in order to pay the inspectors a reasonable salary. I oppose this per diem upon the ground that it provides for the fee system, which obtained not only in the federal courts, but in the state courts years ago, but I believe this fee system has been entirely abandoned, and all state and county officers are now paid a regular salary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this $4 a day, in my judgment, is money used in an indirect way to increase the salaries of the inspectors. If the salaries of the inspectors are not high enough, they ought to be increased. Besides the proof before the committee shows that a large number of these inspectors never leave the home city in which they live. And yet the proof shows beyond a doubt that these inspectors draw their $4 per diem for expense account.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has stated just now that the hearings disclosed that there are inspectors who never leave their homes——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will not yield for a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am going to embody it in the question. Now, if the gentleman does not wish to yield——

Mr. COX of Indiana. I yield for a question. I said that.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will kindly give me the opportunity, I will put my question; otherwise I will desist.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman can exercise his own pleasure as to that. I said I yielded to a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not wish to phrase the question——

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman wants to put a question, let him do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman said that the hearings disclosed that there were inspectors receiving per diem who never left their places of residence or their official domicile. I would like the gentleman to point out in the hearings where there is any such testimony.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I have not time to turn to the hearings and read them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe the gentleman can find any such statement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Probably my statement should be modified to some extent.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think to a very great extent.

Mr. COX of Indiana. To the extent that they had been in the field at least half a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not take exception to that statement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. This is entirely too much money to pay these men, and the proof shows that these inspectors while traveling upon railroads have their train fare paid and their sleeping-car fare paid, and the only thing that this $4 a day goes to pay is simply their hotel bills. Now, I do not believe it to be a proper policy to let these men live at inordinately cheap places, but at the same time I do not believe it to be in the interest of economy that this class of inspectors be permitted to stop at exhorbitantly high-priced hotels. In these days when everybody is talking economy, and, in my judgment, it would not cripple the service in the least to reduce this per diem from $4 to $3 per day, and that reduction would save, upon this item alone, the sum of $81,250.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the $4 always used, all of it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The proof shows that it is always used; that the price is never fixed below $4 per day by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. GARRETT. Was it not the intent of the law that the inspectors should report his actual expenses, and is it not required that he shall send in a voucher?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think they do.

[The time of Mr. Cox of Indiana having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. GARRETT. Is it true that in every instance, notwithstanding the amount that may be reported by the inspector, he is allowed $4?

Mr. COX of Indiana. If he is out as much as a half a day, he is entitled to his full $4 per day.

Mr. GARRETT. That is not the intent of the law, is it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I doubt very much whether it is the intent of the law. It is an indirect way that the inspectors have of getting their salaries increased, something that is radically wrong, something which can not be defended upon any ground, and as I said a while ago, if the salaries of these men are not high enough, let us increase them until we know exactly the amount of money that is being paid to the inspectors in the field doing this kind of work.

I undertake to say that if this amendment be adopted, reducing the amount from $4 to $3 per diem, it will not in the least cripple the service. We shall have just as many good and efficient men in this line of service as we have to-day, when their per diem is $4.

I notice in other appropriation bills which have come upon the floor of Congress, particularly the agricultural appropriation bill, in a major portion of the instances, if not all of them, no per diem at all is allowed, but they pay actual traveling expenses, which is fair. Every time a traveling expense is paid, not only the Government but the people have an opportunity to know exactly what that expense is; but under the per diem system of $4 per day allowed the post-office inspectors nobody can tell what their salaries amount to. Nobody can tell what they are getting for their actual work, and for their expenses while they are doing the actual work. The proof further shows, as I said a while ago, that a large part of these inspectors live in cities, where, to say the least of it, they have the opportunity of being at home every night. They have the opportunity of eating their morning meal at home and the opportunity of eating their dinner at home, and the only expense that they are put to is their midday lunch. This, therefore, resolves itself into the one proposition that we are paying this class of men by indirection a great deal more than the law ever contemplated we should pay them. Upon an average this increases the pay of each inspector $1,080 a year. It is only allowed to the men whose salaries are below $2,000, and yet when we allow them $4 a day we increase the salary of each one of these men $1,080. It is wrong and ought to be remedied, and, in my judgment, the only way to remedy it is to reduce this appropriation and fix this per diem not at $4 per day, but at $3 per day. I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] my colleague on the committee, will not prevail. The post-office inspectors are men of the highest quality. They are the representatives of the department on the road. They must be expert accountants. They must know the postal laws, and in every respect they must represent the department. Furthermore, they must have a capacity for ferreting out crimes against the service. They must to a certain degree be possessed of the qualities of Sherlock Holmes. Now, these inspectors below the $2,000 grade commence their service at $1,200 annually. They usually serve in that grade about four years. Then they are men promoted to the $1,400 grade, and they serve on an average in the $1,400 grade about the same length of time. They then go to the $1,600 grade, and a great majority of the inspectors serve in the $1,400 and $1,600 grades. I am in accord with the gentleman from Indiana to this extent, that it would be better business to pay the inspectors their actual expenses rather than the per diem; that is the system that prevails in the case of inspectors who are paid more than $2,000 a year.

I am also of the opinion that these inspectors who serve for less than $2,000 a year are receiving too little pay for the quality of service they are obliged to furnish, and that we should increase their pay if any change is made in the per diem.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Under the provisions here the men drawing salaries of less than $2,000 really get more pay, some of them, than the $2,000 men.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Tennessee is taking the statement of the gentleman from Indiana literally when he makes that suggestion.

Mr. GARRETT. I was.

Mr. WEEKS. There is a great difference in the pay that these men actually receive. The man who lives in a congested district will naturally save much more from his $4 per diem than the man who lives in a thinly settled district. I doubt if a man in the extreme West can save much of anything from his per diem. I think, on the other hand, that the men who are serving near large cities may be making a material saving. I have talked with an inspector who told me that he saved $300, another one $250, and another one admitted that he saved $400 a year.

The point I want to make is that if any change is to be made in the per diem that has obtained since 1885, when it was reduced from $5 to $4, the salaries of these inspectors who serve outside of cities should be readjusted and they should receive higher salaries.

The department will investigate this subject this year and get returns from the inspectors as to the actual amount that they have to spend for a three-months' period, so that we may have some data on which to base salaries or to pay per diem if we continue it hereafter. My judgment is that the per diem should be discontinued, and after the salaries are adjusted inspectors should be paid actual expenses; but until we have this information I think it would be unfair to reduce the per diem, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman—if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me—as I understand it, the classification of salary is the $2,000 men, and the $1,600, and the $1,400 men, and it is not presumed that the $1,600 man shall get more than the $2,000 man. It is not presumed that the efficiency and experience or the service of a $1,200 man could give him more than the $1,600 man; and yet it seems to me that under this provision there is a possibility that the man who is really in the $1,600 grade may receive more compensation than the man who is in the $2,000 grade, with the proviso that is at the end of this paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. I think there is that possibility. At the same time, if this change is made, it might do a gross injustice to the man who is getting $1,200 a year; he may be located where he is not making more than $100 out of the per diem, and possibly he is not making anything. We should have the real facts before we make any such change as this amendment proposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no denying that if we reduce the per diem as provided in this amendment it will necessarily reduce the salaries of the inspectors. The committee in no instance in this bill have reduced the salary of any official. It is generally known that these inspectors are not the most popular with some persons in official life, but no one will gainsay the importance of having this service up to the maximum of efficiency. In many instances these inspectors do save some money from the allowance of $4 per diem. But the committee believe that we did not have the information at hand whereby we can properly readjust their salaries and provide for only their expense allowance. Who will contend that a man in the $1,600 class of inspectors, who, on an average, has been in the service eight or ten years, is receiving too much salary, even if he should save a certain balance from the per diem allowance in the neighborhood of $400? Who will contend that in certain portions of the country, particularly in the far West, $4 per diem is too large an amount for the inspectors to meet their everyday expenses when in the field?

What will be the result in those sections if you restrict the amount per diem? You will naturally deter the inspectors from going into the field and pursuing the work which they are called upon to perform, and cause them to remain in their offices, whereas if this work is going to be properly performed they should be in the field inspecting depredations and examining post-offices. So I think, with the policy adopted by the committee of calling upon the department to make inquiries as to the expense allowance of the inspectors throughout the country, so that next year when we frame our bill we can have before us data so as to intelligently act in this matter, that it would be better not to adopt this amendment, unless this body insensately is going to reduce salaries pellmell without regard to the conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken and, on a division demanded by Mr. Cox of Indiana, there were—ayes 22, noes 71.

The Clerk read as follows:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation for the fiscal year 1910 of $10,000 for expenses incident to the investigation and testing of mechanical and labor-saving devices, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, for the use of the postal service, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1911.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 6, strike out "ten" in 1910 and insert "nine," so as to read nineteen hundred and nine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices, 4, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 33, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 6, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 6, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 15, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 40, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 75, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 115, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 120, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 275, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 475, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 225, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 181, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 200, at not exceeding $900 each; 150, at not exceeding $800 each; and 140, at not exceeding $700 each; in all, $2,700,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that this appropriation has been increased about $80,000. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill explain why that was done?

Mr. WEEKS. That is to cover natural and necessary increases in the service which the experience of the department has determined are likely to occur.

Mr. MACON. I notice in the paragraph just preceding that that there was an increase of $900,000 in the appropriation carried in it. Will the gentleman explain the necessity for that great increase?

Mr. WEEKS. I will say as to that that the salaries of the postmasters are absolutely fixed by law, and the estimate made by the department is based on previous years and the probable growth of the service.

Mr. MACON. It is to provide for the natural growth of the salaries of the various postmasters?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I believe if the Post-Office Committee wants to make a saving, it can very easily make it in the salaries of the postmasters receiving $2,000 a year or over——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the paragraph fixing the salaries of the postmasters has been passed.

Mr. WEISSE. Then, it would be out of order to say anything in regard to it at this time?

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Chair would so rule unless the gentleman asks to go back to the paragraph.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like to talk for a minute or two if the Chair will allow me or if the chairman of the committee will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts has made a point of order. He just called attention to the fact.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, in this bill the amount for salaries of the postmasters has been increased about 100 per cent from 1897, as shown by the following letter I received from the Postmaster-General:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1910.

Hon. CHARLES H. WEISSE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: With reference to your letter of the 16th instant, I beg to submit the following statement showing the gross receipts, the number of post-offices, the number of employees at first and second class offices, including city carriers, the salaries of postmasters, and the aggregate salaries paid employees for the fiscal years 1897 and 1909:

	1897.	1909.
Number of post-offices	71,022	60,144
Number of employees, first and second class offices (assistant postmasters, clerks, city carriers, laborers, etc.)	26,350	60,640
Postal receipts	$82,665,402	$203,562,383
Salaries of postmasters	$16,908,385	$26,569,893
Salaries of employees, first and second class offices	$23,199,790	$59,283,852

The number of employees at third and fourth class offices is indeterminable from the records of the department, the postmasters at offices of these classes being granted only specified allowances for the payment of clerical assistance and not being required to report to the department the number of such employees.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

In 1897 there were 71,022 postmasters in the service of the United States, receiving a total salary of $16,908,385. In 1909 there were 60,144 postmasters in the service of the United States, receiving a total salary of $26,569,893, or an increase of about 60 per cent, which increase no doubt is due entirely to their political activity, as no one has yet said on this floor that the postmasters of 1909 were a better lot of men and gave us better mail service than the postmasters in 1897. This being a fact the additional compensation of about $10,000,000 yearly is nothing more or less than a campaign contribution of this class of employees in the postal service, and the people no doubt have been taxed to this extent to maintain this one branch of this political machine, which is the greatest political machine in the Government, the head of which is the chairman of the National Republican Committee, the honorable Postmaster-General, who at times does not acknowledge the receipt of a letter until a week or ten days after he has received it.

Another letter of the Postmaster-General is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
February 28, 1910.

Hon. CHARLES H. WEISSE:

Thirty-three postmasters receive over $5,000 a year, aggregating $206,000, as follows: Four at $8,000, and 29 at $6,000.

Five postmasters receive $5,000, and 4 receive $4,000 per annum, aggregating $41,000.

Three hundred and fifty-six postmasters receive salaries ranging from $3,000 to $3,900, inclusive, aggregating $1,161,600.

One thousand seven hundred and four postmasters receive from $2,000 to $2,900, inclusive, aggregating $4,004,400.

Two thousand five hundred and twenty-nine postmasters receive from $1,500 to $1,900, aggregating $4,162,100.

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

I find that there are 33 postmasters who receive over $5,000 a year, and I take these facts from a letter of the Postmaster-General, which letter I will incorporate with my remarks. There are 5 postmasters who are receiving from $4,000 to $5,000 a year, 356 postmasters who are receiving a salary of from $3,000 to $4,000, and 1,704 postmasters who receive a salary of from $2,000 to $3,000 a year. I would say that if the committee wants to make a saving it should change present law of postmasters' salary here at this time, saving at least several million dollars in the appropriation for the postmasters, and repeal that law and classify them and put them on different basis than they were in 1883. I further wish to say that if they want to adopt a business policy and business principles, to use business methods, and to do that would be as my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], stated this morning, elect the postmasters by the people in their own districts and thus take it out of politics, and if you would do this you would get these $5,000 postmasters——

Mr. FASSETT. Would that take it out of politics?

Mr. WEISSE. Absolutely it would, if you would let the people elect them. [Laughter.] You could get in any one of these $5,000 offices a man taken from the Railway Mail Service who is more able, who knows more about the post-office service than the postmasters, and you pay him only $1,100 a year.

I have spent some time on this floor this week listening to the general debate on this post-office appropriation bill, which carries over $240,000,000. I have heard some Members advocate more pay for the rural carriers, no doubt because they had rural carriers in their district. I have heard others advocate more pay for the railway mail clerks; no doubt they were friends of theirs. I have heard others advocate more pay for city carriers—city carriers in their district. Not a single Member upon this floor has stated that we could not get all the men that we needed in the service at the present salaries we are paying, nor has anyone said that the service was suffering on account of low pay to their men.

Now, in my estimation, the lowest paid employee in the service, who has to perform the hardest work for the least money, and is away from home a great deal of the time, is the railway mail clerk; but he is satisfied, as we are having no trouble in getting all the men we need in that service. He is the man that must have the most ability of anyone in the service, postmaster not excepted. If this is true, would it not be well to consider the men who are being taxed to pay them. Are we offering any relief to them in any way, shape, or manner? Is anybody sympathizing on this floor with the taxpayer of this country on the other side of the House? If so, I have not heard it. There are about 400,000 employees in the postal service of this country. We are taxing 90,000,000 people to pay them for this service. According to the statement of Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey, Canada is paying about 47 per cent of the gross receipts of the post-office for salaries and we are paying 60 per cent, which shows at once where there is a great loss in the postal service compared with the Canadian service.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] shows in his speech in the RECORD that if the Government would ship by freight all of the boxed envelopes and post-office supplies, mail equipments, and other matter in freightable lots—freight rates to Chicago are about 75 cents a hundred, mail rates from $9 to $12 a hundred—they could make a saving of least one-third the cost, which would be $15,000,000, of the transportation charges to the railroad. Why should a box of printed envelopes be carried as mail matter by the railroads and a box of franked envelopes not allowed the same privilege, both paying the mail rate by the Post-Office Department? Why should a wooden box used by a Member of Congress be frankable when full of public documents and not returnable empty with the same privilege?

These conditions exist, according to the debates on the post-office bill, and some Members get up and say that we could not make any changes that would be of any benefit. The facts presented in this debate show where a great many changes can be made, and at least, to my knowledge and belief, a saving of $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 can be made in this bill, and we will have equally as good service as we now have. This debate shows that our foreign mail service pays us a profit of over $5,000,000; our domestic service, a loss of $17,000,000, with the same rate of postage.

We are told, however, by the President that we want a business administration and want to put it on a business basis. I wonder where he got his business training?

Well, Mr. Chairman, I spoke to a United States Senator in regard to appointing a postmaster, and he stated to me that he did not feel like making a change because the postmaster attended all political conventions of his party.

I, as a business man, do not want postmasters to attend political conventions, as they had a great deal of trouble in one of the Republican state conventions in our State. It contained stalwarts and half-breed postmasters, and before they got through the stalwarts had left the hall and nominated a state ticket. The half-breeds held their convention and nominated a state ticket. We had election the next fall in our State; our senior Senator was elected governor and passed a direct-primary election law. The Republicans in our State have had no state convention of this kind since. The postmasters now get busy at home getting the people to vote for their different candidates at the primaries, and only have retail troubles, where formerly they had troubles by the wholesale amongst the leaders themselves.

I for one, as a taxpayer of this country, am absolutely opposed to these present conditions existing any longer, where I am being taxed with others to the amount of, no doubt, $50,000,000 as a campaign fund, for no other purpose than to sustain the present system, to keep in power and continue their lieutenants in office. I was told at one of the departments that they discontinued a light-house—to protect the lives of sailors—in my district, which cost $1,000 a year to maintain, because they did not have money enough in the fund to maintain it. A business administration pure and simple, no doubt, without any business training. A commission is asked for by the head of this Nation and by the Senator from Rhode Island, the boss. Why? Because they are so wrapped up in the system that they can not break it themselves without losing their jobs, and now are asking for a commission to shoulder the responsibility, to take off the leeches, so that they can still hold their job and fool the people for another four years, but the people will relieve them next election and defeat everyone that belongs to the system. My Democratic friends, a great many of them, have very little to say; no doubt they want to practice the same system if they get into power, but I wish to warn them now, if they do not change these conditions when they get into office that they will not be reelected the second time. The people are being educated; they want a change; and the system must go out of business.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of assistant postmasters hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how the salaries of assistant postmasters are now fixed?

Mr. WEEKS. The salaries of the assistant postmasters are limited by law to one-half the salary of the postmaster. The amount, however, appropriated for the salaries of assistant postmasters does not aggregate a sufficient amount to pay one-half the salaries of postmasters where there are assistant postmasters. The reason for this is the department passes on each case individually. If an office seems to deserve a salary equal to one-half of the postmaster's salary, that allowance is made; but in many cases where there are assistant postmasters the work of the office does not seem to require a man who should be paid a salary equal to one-half the salary of the postmaster, and in those cases the salary is reduced in proportion to the requirements of the service.

Mr. MANN. Is not that a matter that can properly be left to the discretion of the department, as to whether the assistant postmaster's salary shall be one-half or only 45 per cent of the salary of the postmaster, without permitting that pressure to be brought upon a man through the department?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, that is just what is done. It is within the discretion of the department to determine what the salary shall be.

Mr. MANN. Well, it would be without this provision, but with this provision in it the department does not have the discretion to determine what the man's salary shall be. If they shall wish an assistant postmaster at 50 per cent, that 50 per cent is increasing the amount of the appropriation over the amount provided for here. Now, the law, as it stands, permits the Postmaster-General to fix the salary of the assistant postmaster at 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary. If in doing that the amount awarded for salaries of assistant postmasters amounts to more than is provided here in the post-office appropriation bill, that is a sufficient warrant for a deficiency appropriation bill and a deficiency appropriation, and I notice this same thing runs all through this bill. I am not interested myself in any way personally in the salaries of assistant postmasters, but if the law contemplates that the Postmaster-General shall, in a proper case, fix the salary of an assistant postmaster at post-office A at 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary, then he ought to have the same authority at post-office B, if he chooses to exercise that authority, it seems to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is usually correct, but in this instance he is far from the path of correctness. The very purpose of this limitation is to restrict the discretion of the Postmaster-General so that he can not raise the salary of assistant postmasters to the maximum amount of 50 per cent and to limit the total expenditure to the amount appropriated in the bill. The phraseology is as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of assistant postmasters hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Referring to the total sum which is appropriated. Now, this total sum that is carried in this bill, aggregating $2,700,000, is not sufficient, by any means, to pay all the assistant postmasters at the maximum of 50 per cent. In fact, five years ago we established three subordinate grades of $900, $800, and $700 to provide for assistant postmasters at small second-class offices that had just emerged from the third class, believing that in those instances it was not good business policy to pay assistant postmasters the initial salary of $1,000.

This limitation is the only means in this appropriation whereby Congress has any control whatsoever over the appropriations and that forces the department to restrict and cut down the salaries of assistant postmasters below the 50 per cent amount. But it is fair to say to the Members of the House that except in the classes below $1,200, or, rather, in those cases of post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $2,400 and under, it is the rule in all other cases for the department to grant the 50 per cent, and the assistant postmaster has a salary of 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster.

It is only in the lower grades that the department in any particular restricts the maximum allowance of 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster, and I think that the gentleman, upon further consideration of this paragraph, when he has time in connection with his other duties, will come to the conclusion that this is a limitation along the lines that I have indicated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I have said before, I have no interest in any assistant postmasters. So far as this item is concerned, I withdraw the point of order, but I shall raise it on some other items in this bill where it is far more pertinent.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the House cares to hear any more about this matter, but it is a fact that the present condition and the section of the bill in the way it reads is an evolution. The segregations that you read in this section were not embodied in the old appropriation bills at all. The law allowed an assistant postmaster to have half of the salary of the postmaster. The practice before this plan of segregation was adopted was to appoint assistants as long as the money held out, and then stop, but all that were appointed got the 50 per cent, resulting in a very great inequality, in that the offices that came in the class the latter part of the year, in many instances, would be more meritorious than some of those already supplied with assistants. The Postmaster-General himself suggested a way out of it, and, to get away from their own former construction, when we came to make these segregations, suggested that we should classify and limit the number in each class and fix the maximum of the salary, making it 50 per cent. So the section as it now reads represents an evolution from the old system, first, of segregating, and then overcoming the construction that it was the congressional intent that each must have 50 per cent. It was all, you see, in the interest of better administration.

Mr. MANN. Now, it is a reward of diligence, I suppose—this getting of 50 per cent?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; as a reward of diligence in a general way, Mr. Chairman, in the Post-Office Department, for, after all the clatter and claptrap, diligence in the post-offices comes nearer to receiving its just recognition than in any other department of the Government of the United States, in my opinion. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post-offices.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, after line 19, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"That after June 30, 1910, employees in first and second class post-offices and in other post-offices having City Delivery Service shall be granted leave of absence with full pay for not exceeding thirty days in a fiscal year."

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. GOEBEL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] withhold the point of order a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. I reserve it.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Massachusetts withholds his point of order for a moment. I think I can convince him of the justice of this amendment, and I think I can convince this committee of the justice of it. The purpose of the amendment is to put the post-office employees upon equal footing with every other employee of this Government, to wit, to grant them a leave of absence for thirty days with pay. Whether that ought to be done enters into the question of administration of that great department, and I assume, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Department is better able to judge as to whether this is desirable and whether it is in the interest of the department than we are. I want to call the gentleman's attention and the attention of this committee to the report of the Postmaster-General, made to this House in 1907, in which he said:

I renew the recommendation of last year for legislative authority to grant post-office employees thirty days' annual leave instead of fifteen, as at present. I am strongly in favor of this plan, as by its adoption the post-office employees would be placed on an equality with the classified employees in practically all other branches of the government service.

In 1908 he renewed his recommendation. In 1908 he said:

Under the law employees of the executive departments in Washington may be allowed thirty days' annual leave with pay, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, and in case of sickness thirty days' additional leave with pay. Post-office clerks and city letter carriers are entitled by law to fifteen days' leave with pay, exclusive of Sundays and holidays. The recommendation was made last year that the leave of absence with pay allowed by law to employees of the postal service be increased to thirty days. These employees are required to work Sundays and holidays and at all hours of the night. In the case of post-office clerks, during the holiday season they are frequently on duty from ten to fifteen hours daily, and if they are sick their pay is forfeited. If other employees of the Government may be granted thirty days' leave with pay and in case of sickness an additional leave of thirty days, surely the hard-working post-office clerks and city letter carriers are entitled to at least thirty days' leave with pay as a maximum.

Post-office clerks and city letter carriers should be placed on a par in this regard with employees in other branches of the federal service, and it is confidently believed that the improved health and increased vigor and enthusiasm of the employees would justify the cost of the change. Like every other improvement in the conditions of the employment, it would tend to bring better men into the service.

In the case of post-office clerks it is in most instances feasible to grant leave of absence with pay during the dull season of the year without any expense, by requiring the clerks on duty to render extra service and do the work of those on leave.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I disturb the gentleman?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that the railway mail clerks only get fifteen days' leave of absence. Why not cover them in your proposition?

Mr. GOEBEL. Well, we will come to them later in the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They are the most deserving class we have in the whole service.

Mr. GOEBEL. We are now considering clerks and carriers.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You could cover them in just as well as the others.

Mr. GOEBEL (reading):

The entire appropriation for substitutes for clerks on vacation is only $110,000. In the case of letter carriers, however, the practice has been to allow a substitute in the place of each carrier every day of his annual leave, so that the expense of allowing a carrier fifteen days' leave with pay—including intervening Sundays and holidays—would be about $40, or for the 26,352 carriers in the service on June 30, 1908, more than $1,000,000 per annum. Believing that the cost of carriers' vacations could be decreased by reducing the number of collections and deliveries in residential districts during the heated term when many of the patrons are away from home, an experiment was tried last summer to ascertain how much could be saved in this way without impairing the efficiency of the service, with the result that an economy of more than $100,000 was effected. It is believed, therefore, that if authority is given the department to allow clerks and carriers not to exceed thirty days' leave of absence with pay in each fiscal year, the expense will not be by any means double the cost of allowing them fifteen days' leave under present conditions.

Now, then, the First Assistant Postmaster-General in his last report says:

The department is on record as favoring thirty days' leave of absence with pay for clerks and carriers in first and second class post-offices. The present cost of employing substitutes for clerks on vacation during the fifteen days' leave now authorized by law is less than $110,000 per annum. The cost of carriers' vacations, however, owing to the necessity for employing substitutes for a large part of the time the carriers are on leave is much larger, although last year by rearrangement of their routes and in some instances by curtailing deliveries and collections during the summer season, a considerable reduction in the time served by substitutes was effected, representing a saving of more than $150,000. A still larger saving will be shown at the close of the present fiscal year. It is estimated, however, that an appropriation of not less than $500,000 additional for substitutes would be required to allow letter carriers thirty days' leave of absence with pay and $100,000 additional for substitutes for clerks. Nevertheless, if other employees of the Government are allowed a vacation of thirty days there are the strongest arguments in favor of a like provision for employees of the postal service.

Mr. FASSETT. The departmental employees do get thirty days' leave of absence now, do they not?

Mr. GOEBEL. I think so.

The midwinter holidays, instead of bringing rest and recreation to postal employees add to their burdens, and in the case of clerks lengthen their workday far into the night. All are required to perform more or less service on Sundays and holidays and at night. The additional vacation would be gratefully appreciated and the Government, it is believed, would receive a full return for the outlay in the improved health and increased capacity for work of the employees affected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in the hearings before the committee, again suggested that this provision be inserted in this bill. I hope my friend will see the justice of this amendment. I hope he will withdraw his point of order, and that we may, by adopting this amendment, do justice to these employees and put them upon a par with other employees of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule.

Clause 2 of Rule XXI, with which the committee is very familiar, provides that "no provision changing existing law is in order on an appropriation bill or upon any amendment thereto." This amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is clearly legislative in character and therefore repugnant to the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, after line 19, amend by inserting:

"That after June 30, 1910, clerks in post-offices of the first and second classes shall be required to work not exceeding forty-eight hours each week, including such number of hours on Sundays and intervening holidays as may be required by the interests of the postal service.

"That clerks shall be required to work in shifts of eight consecutive hours, or as nearly so as practicable.

"That should any clerk or clerks herein provided for be employed more than forty-eight hours during any week, they shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary they are receiving."

Mr. WEEKS. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the principle involved in this amendment has for a long time been recognized by the Government. It has been recognized that the Government should not exact more than eight hours a day from its employees, and many of the government employees are only required to work eight hours a day now. The great majority of the government employees, as I understand, are limited in the hours which they are required to work by statutory provision; but for some strange reason no law has ever been enacted to limit in any way the hours of the post-office clerks. The clerks of the post-office of the city from which I come are frequently required to work ten and eleven hours a day without any additional compensation. It seems a strange condition of things that these men employed in this particular branch of the government service should be required to work a number of hours greatly in excess of the hours required, not only in their department, but by other men in the same branch of the service in the same office, if you please.

There has been an effort on the part of the Post-Office Department to reduce the hours of post-office clerks in the past by increasing the number of post-office clerks; but it is still true that in many post-offices of the first and second classes clerks are compelled to work very much in excess of nine and ten, and sometimes in excess of eleven hours in a day. The clerks receive no compensation whatever for such extra hours of labor. Neither is consideration of any kind extended to them on account of the hours they devote to the study of difficult schemes of mail distribution outside of their official hours of duty. And I may say here that every clerk employed in the Post-Office Department is required to spend hours every day of his service in the department in the study of schemes for the distribution of the mails. When he completes the study of one scheme, he is started out on the study of another scheme, and when he has completed this, he has imposed upon him the study of still another scheme, and so on all during his service, no matter how long that service may be.

That conditions as to the hours of the clerks are not worse is due to the fact that the Congress, on the recommendation of the Post-Office Department, has each year provided for additional clerks to meet conditions caused by the constantly increasing volume of mail.

In the post-office appropriation bill now pending no provision is made for the employment of additional clerks during the next fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1910. This is the first time that no such provision has been made, and it will mean that the hours of the clerks will become even more excessive and that the efficiency of the service will suffer. Without a sufficient force to handle the mails there must be delay and failure to make important mail-train connections.

All additional clerks are employed in the $600 grade. The department in its estimates asked for 1,800 clerks in this particular grade. The Post-Office Committee in the appropriation bill only provides for 296 clerks in this grade. Unless the 1,800 clerks are restored in this grade there can be no appointment of additional clerks, as I see it. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can show where we can employ additional clerks, but I have not yet been able to figure it out.

In his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, the First Assistant Postmaster-General states that on June 30, 1909, there were 29,320 clerks employed in the first and second class post-offices, a net increase over the preceding fiscal year of 1,710 clerks. These 29,930 clerks were employed in the 398 first-class offices and 1,707 second-class offices, a total of 2,105 post-offices. Of this number of post-offices 1,440 were city-delivery offices or offices having letter-carrier service, while the remainder, or 665, were second-class offices without city-delivery service. In 1900 there were 14,886 clerks employed in first and second class offices. In ten years the number has just about doubled. In ten years the number of first and second class post-offices, including delivery and nondelivery offices, have doubled. The number of employees in other branches of the service has doubled.

The receipts of the service in 1900 amounted to $102,354,579, and in 1909 the amount was $203,562,383, lacking only $1,146,775 of having doubled. The number of pieces of mail handled doubled, while the number of letters registered and money orders issued more than doubled. At the present time the receipts of the 50 largest post-offices of the country are increasing at the rate of 12½ per cent. This ratio of increase, if maintained, is twice the percentage of increase for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, and three times the increase for the year ended June 30, 1908. Additional clerks will be even more necessary than in former years to handle this increased volume of business. Additional clerks can only be appointed to the $600 grade.

Unless the House makes provision for the 1,800 clerks asked for by the department in the $600 grade, then no additional clerks can be appointed.

If no additional clerks can be appointed, the hours of service must be increased, and additional burdens must be placed upon the shoulders of the men in the service.

The Government recognizes the humanitarian side of the labor proposition, and having committed itself to the eight-hour day in nearly every branch of its service, should give these men who are acting as clerks in the postal service the same advantages that are accorded to men in all other branches of the government service.

No class of men render better service than these men. They are patriotic, painstaking, attentive to their duties. Their integrity is beyond question. They are required to make a study of the work in which they are engaged. They are not only required to be efficient while at work, but from the moment they enter the service until they leave it they are required to make a special study of the work which they are called upon to do. My judgment is that no more meritorious measure could be adopted as a part of the pending legislation than the amendment which is now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist on his point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I insist on the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois; but before doing so I want to call attention to the extravagant character of the statements he has been making about the hours of labor in post-offices. I will limit my statement to the Chicago post-office, because that is the one in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is especially interested. Instead of clerks working nine, ten, eleven, and sometimes more, hours a day, as the gentleman from Illinois has stated, the actual time that clerks were employed in the Chicago post-office for the first five months of this fiscal year was eight hours and three minutes a day. I obtained those figures from the department, and it is correct.

Mr. MANN. For what time?

Mr. WEEKS. The first five months of this fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. That is the lightest season of the year.

Mr. WEEKS. It is not the lightest.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is—July, August, September, October, November.

Mr. WEEKS. September is a very large month in all post-offices. The clerks work overtime more in September than in any other month in the year except December.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that the clerks in the Chicago post-office work over nine hours; that is, in the mailing division. When you take all the clerks in the post-office and figure up the time they may not work but a little over eight hours. But take the boys in the mailing division and the other divisions and they work over nine hours a day.

Mr. WEEKS. It is the policy of the Post-Office Department to limit the hours as near to eight hours a day as it can be done and promote the efficiency of the service. There are some months when it is absolutely necessary to work longer than eight hours a day, but that happens in all mercantile business affairs. There are times when they work a shorter time and times when they work a longer period. The clerks in the Chicago office for the first three months of the calendar year worked less than eight hours a day. The fact remains that the number of clerks, outside of the distributors, who are working more than eight hours a day in any post-office is a negligible quantity. If more clerks are needed in the Chicago post-office, there are 1,900 available in last year's appropriation bill, and I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois make application for additional clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the post-office authorities will have the power after this bill is law to appoint additional clerks, which he says are now available, after the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not the money covered into the Treasury?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but we have appropriated money enough in this bill to cover additional clerks.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will permit me, how many additional clerks has the committee appropriated for?

Mr. WEEKS. I will state that later when we come to that subject.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman can not state now?

Mr. WEEKS. I can, but I prefer to wait.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that this changes existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of mails, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, finance clerks, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of stations, 22, at not exceeding $2,200 each.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman why it is that the superintendent of registry has been stricken from this paragraph of the bill?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many titles among the higher officials of the Post-Office Department which seem to conflict with one another. The department officials admit that there might be eliminated from this very large list of titles perhaps one-half of them, and the men who are employed under these titles employed under some other title which would be equally applicable. It does not decrease the number of employees, but removes one title from the list of those which have heretofore prevailed.

Mr. MADDEN. There was provision for one superintendent of registry which this bill omits, and I would like to know if it does not eliminate that place?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from Illinois will consent to pass over this, I will look it up and see if it is not included in some other provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, bookkeepers, cashiers, examiners of stations, finance clerks, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, superintendents of inquiry, and superintendents of stations, 95, at not exceeding $2,000 each.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman how many promotions are authorized in this series here and above, included in the $1,300 a year?

Mr. WEEKS. None.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is it the judgment of the committee that they can carry on effective work in this large enterprise and not make any provision for promotion in the supervisory grade?

Mr. WEEKS. I want to say in reply to that that in my judgment there should be some change made, possibly in the numbers and possibly in the pay of the supervisory officials. There are a large number that are not carried at a higher rate than $1,200 a year, some even under that rate of pay, but the committee did not have information before it which seemed to warrant making any change which would be systematic in character. There are undoubtedly men employed as supervisors who are receiving less pay than they should, and some method should be evolved which will cover that service and enable a classification which will return to each man suitable pay.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am asking these questions strictly for information. Is it the intention of the gentleman to recommend to his committee that some such reclassification and readjustment as he indicates be taken up in connection with the postal bill now before his committee introduced by himself?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think that would be done in this bill, but I should think it would be done, after information has been furnished, in the next appropriation bill, which would change the numbers and the rates of pay.

Mr. KELIHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if the committee considered the scheme of regulating the salary of these men by receipts?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee did not consider any particular scheme to any extent, because the scheme of the department has never been followed, and it is not in such shape that it seemed to the committee that changes could be made at this time.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not necessary to authorize expenditures generally, so that the department can make increases in certain localities? You can not pick out localities very well.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that the localities can be picked out, that it will depend very much on the receipts in any particular locality, and at the same time it ought not to depend entirely on the receipts.

Mr. PARSONS. Then the gentleman would make the compensation to the superintendents and assistant superintendents in substations dependent upon receipts?

Mr. WEEKS. I should make them dependent on receipts and dependent on the number of men they have under their charge, and the whole character of the service which they are responsible for directly to the postmaster.

Mr. PARSONS. Is not that something that should be included in the general reorganization bill which the gentleman has introduced?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not sure that it should be. I think it can be properly done in an appropriation bill. However, I want to investigate it further before I am ready to give a definite answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. PARSONS. I want to say that we felt, in some of the larger cities, that there ought to have been this increase, and have felt so for some years, but it has been held back on the ground of economy. We hope next year that what is necessary will be done.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the ground of economy should carry as much weight this year as in previous years; but the committee hopes next year to report something which will make some change in these supervisory offices.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendent of mails, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, special clerks, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 630, at not exceeding $1,300 each.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. What is meant by "examiners of stations?" What is that intended to convey?

Mr. WEEKS. There are several such men in every large post-office, and it is their business to examine the accounts. They are auditors in the substations.

Mr. MADDEN. Then why not call them "auditors," so that we will know what is meant?

Mr. WEEKS. I raised exactly that question in the hearings, and the answer was that they had some other duties than acting as auditors; that they did some inspection work; and that "examiners of stations" was thought to be a rather better title than auditor.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has any provision been made for any increase in the number of superintendents of stations at all?

Mr. WEEKS. There has not.

Mr. OLCOTT. Was not that recommended by the First Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. OLCOTT. The committee took it under consideration and decided not to do it?

Mr. WEEKS. Decided not to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reverting to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as to the absence of the term "superintendents of registry" in the paragraph on page 6, lines 17 to 22, I wish to say that in the bill of last year that phrase was carried, and as the phrase is found in the paragraph before and the paragraph that follows, I believe it is better to have it inserted here, and I therefore offer an amendment to insert, after the word "order," in line 20, page 6, the words "superintendents of registry."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, that was passed without prejudice upon the request of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 20, after the word "order," insert the words "superintendents of registry."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, chief stamp clerks, clerks, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 10,345, at not exceeding $1,200 each.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill as to this enormous increase in the number of clerks provided for in this paragraph. It seems they are increased from 6,961 of last year to 10,345 this year. That is an enormous increase of employees in one department, it strikes me—about 50 per cent.

Mr. MANN. That follows the law, that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the classification act providing for automatic promotions that passed Congress four years ago, Congress surrendered to the department authority over promotions in all classes from $600 to $1,100 in offices of the first class and from $600 to $1,000 in offices of the second class, leaving the discretion with Congress on the amount appropriated for promotions in the grades above those, namely, $1,100 to $1,200 in first-class offices and $1,000 to $1,100 in second-class offices. Last year and the year before Congress, in its good judgment, voted an increase of 50 per cent of all clerks in the $1,100 grade to be promoted to the salary of $1,200——

Mr. MACON. Fifty per cent of the number?

Mr. STAFFORD. Those who for a year had been receiving a salary of $1,100. And last year, for the first time, Congress, without any recommendation of the department and in opposition to the judgment of the committee, provided for an increase of 50 per cent of clerks from the $1,000 maximum grade in the automatic scale of promotions in second-class offices to $1,100. This year the committee, following the policy of the House and of the Congress last year, provided for 50 per cent for promotions in the $1,000 grade in second-class offices and in the $1,100 grade in first-class offices.

Mr. MACON. That is 50 per cent increase in number, I believe?

Mr. STAFFORD. This number here stated is more than 50 per cent, and will be more than what will be needed during the forthcoming year. Of course Congress has surrendered the question of promotions to the department, and it loses control over the number in the grades where automatic promotions take place; for if Congress would provide a less number of places in the respective grades from $1,200 to $600, the department would necessarily be obliged to promote the clerks—and this applies to carriers as well—to the places above, even if there were not adequate places or adequate appropriations. Each one of the clerks and carriers would be entitled, by reason of that promotion which is guaranteed to them under the law, to the increased salary, which would be recognized in the Court of Claims.

In studying the various numbers provided in this grade and the grades below, and as the subject has been forecasted by the gentleman from Illinois when he states that no provision is made for additional clerks during the forthcoming fiscal year, it might be well, while I have the floor, to explain——

Mr. MACON. I thought I had the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman has the floor I will gladly surrender to him.

Mr. MACON. I desired to ask the gentleman a few questions before he takes his seat.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to reply, so far as I can.

Mr. MACON. You say under the law this number of employees has been increased 50 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifty per cent.

Mr. MACON. That is, 50 per cent of them have been promoted?

Mr. STAFFORD. Last year all the clerks who attained the efficiency test after being employed for one year in the $1,100 grade were promoted to the $1,200 grade, and the same is true of carriers.

Mr. MACON. That moved 50 per cent of them up to a higher grade?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifty per cent of them.

Mr. MACON. Does that mean that there are 50 per cent of new employees added to this force every year?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not 50 per cent of new employees. Suppose the service would not require any more additional clerks. Under the effect of the automatic promotion law the salaries of clerks would rise each year from $600 to $1,100 and $1,200, until all had reached the maximum grade of $1,100 or $1,200, and there would be no one in the lower grades.

Mr. MACON. Will not the lower grades increase correspondingly?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to answer that question. If the gentleman will give me the time, I will try to enlighten him as far as I can. With the growth of the service there are necessarily additional clerks required. Some years the average has been 1,750. During boom years, when business is on the increase abnormally, the number of clerks is in the neighborhood of 2,100; in this bill we make provision for additional clerks to the number of 2,100. Those new clerks would necessarily have to be provided in the lowest grade, because they enter the service at the lowest salary, that of $600, and after serving in that grade for one year they are promoted under the automatic law to $800 salary.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of continuing the explanation that I began a minute ago in the time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] brought to the attention of the committee what he believed to be inadequate provision for additional clerks for the next fiscal year, and claimed that we had not made provision for any additional clerks. I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that these numbers as carried in the grades from $1,200 to $600 are aggregate numbers that will not be reached in appointment of clerks during the next fiscal year. I can best explain that by citing the conditions in these respective grades on December 31 last. Take, for instance, the maximum grade of $1,200. Provision was made in the bill of the present year for 6,961, whereas on that date but 5,870 were provided. In the $1,100 grade provision was made for 7,815, and but 5,434 were in the service. In the $1,000 grade 6,000 were provided and 6,479 were in the service, more than were provided in that respective grade. In the $900 grade 5,000 were provided, and in the service on December 31 there were 4,679. In the $800 grade there was provision made for 4,000 clerks, and on December 31, 2,848, less by 1,200 than the number that was provided.

Here I wish to direct the attention of those gentlemen who believe we have not made provision for the increase in service during the next fiscal year to the following:

In the $600 grade the present law provides for but 1,625, and yet on December 31 there were twice that number and more in the service, namely, 3,570. In the minds of the Members there naturally arises the query as to how that is possible. It is all brought about by the phraseology in the bill, which says——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield as soon as I finish this explanation. The phraseology in these respective grades that designates the number is followed by the words "at not exceeding" the stated amount. The words "not exceeding" enable the department to avail themselves of the employment in the grades below of the number not employed in the higher grades. Otherwise, the department would be limited in the $600 grade to the number provided in the last bill, which is but 1,625, whereas on December 31, as I have just stated, there were 3,570. Now, taking up the question in the aggregate, I will try to demonstrate as well as I can the provision we make for additional service.

If Members will follow me closely, I think they will be able to agree that we have made ample provision for all the clerks necessary for the coming year. On December 31 there were employed in the grades from $1,200 to $600, 28,880. In the grades above $1,200 there were employed 1,750, making a total of all clerks and supervisory officials of 30,630. The testimony of First Assistant Postmaster-General Grandfield before the committee was that between January 1 and the end of the fiscal year—June 30—there would be appointed 450 additional clerks that would be in the service on June 30 of this year. Adding that number to the 30,630 that were in the service on December 31 last would make 31,080. In this bill we make provision for the maximum number of 33,200. The difference between 33,200 and 31,080 is 2,120. No one can dispute the accuracy of that statement. The First Assistant Postmaster-General recommends an increase for the next fiscal year of 2,125. We have conformed to the estimate of the department in this particular by providing additional clerks to the extent of all recommended except five. Where is the man that will say that that is not an adequate number of men according to the facts as advanced by the First Assistant Postmaster-General when he testified before the committee?

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. OLCOTT rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois, to whom I had previously promised to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I went somewhat carefully over the hearings, and if the gentleman will allow me to go at some length into this thing, I will be able to get at the point I wish to make.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would rather surrender the floor, if it is going to be a detailed statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to have it in connection with your statement.

Mr. OLCOTT. I want to ask you but one question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will have to decline to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, if the gentleman is going to make a lengthy statement.

Mr. MADDEN. It is simply in line with your statement; I have made out some figures about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman, if he will not take too much of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not. I have made a somewhat careful study of the hearings of the Post-Office Committee. The total appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices carried in the pending appropriation bill is $33,900,000. This sum is $800,000 less than the estimate of the department for this purpose. This is taken from page 43 of the hearings.

The department estimates it will cost to pay the salaries of all clerks in all grades that will be in the service on the 30th of June, 1910 (the end of the present fiscal year), and during the next fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1910, the sum of $32,345,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will have to decline to yield further, because that is a subject to which I have not addressed myself at all. The gentleman from Illinois is now challenging whether the appropriation as provided in this bill is adequate for the number of persons that we provide for. I was only engaged in trying to show to the members of the committee that we had made ample provision for the number of men required by the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may have more time.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have ten minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman is fair, and I am sure that he wants to be fair.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has not been recognized, but when recognized will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. My time has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, certainly the gentleman does not wish to make that charge directly or impliedly that I am not fair. The gentleman took up the question of appropriations. I had directed my attention to the number of employees, and the gentleman interrogates as to the appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said a while ago that provision had been made for a sufficient number of men to properly equip the Post-Office Department, and when I undertook to analyze his statement, and I had received his courteous consent, he listened to me, and after he knew I was analyzing his statement he wished to yield to the gentleman from New York. The gentleman did not want to be embarrassed by having an intelligent statement made on the subject.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall have to decline to yield further to the gentleman. When he says that I unqualifiedly yielded to him for any kind of inquiry, I prefaced my yielding with the remark that I would yield within some limits. When I ascertained that he was directing an inquiry on different lines, I thought that, for the best interests of expedition in the consideration of this bill, I should first consider the questions as to the numbers, and I will be glad to consider the other phase of it later.

Mr. MADDEN. I will take the floor in my own right later.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield now on a question which is directly in point?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us now how many clerks are provided for in this bill in and under the $1,200 grade?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean the bill that we are now considering?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not those figures right before me, but I can readily give them to the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. MANN. It is a mere matter of computation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am making the computation now. There are 31,448. The way I arrive at that is this: According to the estimate of the department there were 32,952, and they provided in their schedule for 1,800 in the $600 grade, whereas we provide for but 296, a difference of 1,504. Deducting 1,504, it leaves 31,448.

Mr. MANN. While those figures do not quite agree with the figures which I have, is there any increase in this bill over current law above the $1,200 grade?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; none whatsoever.

Mr. MANN. What is the total increase of clerks in the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Two thousand one hundred and twenty——

Mr. MANN. No; over the number authorized by law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Required by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. As required by law.

Mr. MANN. I am not using the expression "required by law." "Authorized by law" is the term that correctly expresses it.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the present law there is a provision for 33,153 of both clerks and supervisory officials. I will have to do some figuring to give the number of clerks authorized in the grades of $1,200 and under.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman had it before him.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; and I do not know whether the clerk of the committee has it either. I can furnish it to the gentleman readily after a little calculation.

Mr. OLCOTT. I wish to ask the gentleman how much provision is made for the appointment of $600 clerks by this appropriation bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. We make provision for the appointment of 2,120.

Mr. OLCOTT. Have you appropriated money for that number?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am so informed by the clerk of the committee, who has computed the various sums required in these respective grades. He says that the appropriation is adequate to provide for the service.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to print here in the RECORD a statement in regard to the appropriations for the clerks of the various grades. I ask unanimous consent to print it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLCOTT. The Post-Office Committee has cut the estimates for compensation of post-office clerks by $800,000. The committee makes no provision for the promotion of any of the supervisory officials, though the First Assistant Postmaster-General stated at the hearings that there are at the present time 655 supervisory officials receiving only $1,200 per annum. This compensation is entirely insufficient when the responsibilities of their positions are considered, and all of these men have spent years in the Postal Service.

A table is submitted herewith, showing in detail the present number of clerks authorized for each grade, the number in each grade requested by the department in the Book of Estimates, and the number finally allowed in each grade by the Post-Office Committee:

Salary grades.	Number of clerks provided for in last appropriation bill for fiscal year ending June 30, 1910. APPROPRIATION FOR CLERKS IN FIRST AND SECOND CLASS POST-OFFICES.

The total appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices carried in the pending post-office appropriation bill amounts to $33,900,000

This sum is $800,000 less than the estimates of the department for this purpose (p. 43, Hearings). The department estimates it will cost to pay the salaries of all clerks, in all grades, who will be in the service on June 30, 1910 (the end of the present fiscal year), during the next fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1910, the sum of $32,345,000

This will leave a balance of the appropriation for all purposes for the next fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1910, amounting to $1,555,000.

To make the promotions provided for by law (successive promotion after one year of service in a grade, up to $1,100 in first-class offices and up to $1,000 in second-class offices) will cost, approximately (see "Automatic promotions," p. 43, Hearings) 1,000,000

According to the statement of Chairman WEEKS, the appropriation bill provides for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in first-class post-offices from $1,100 to $1,200 per annum and for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in second-class post-offices from $1,000 to $1,100 per annum. The department estimates the cost of promoting 50 per cent of these $1,100 clerks in first-class offices at 235,000

The department estimates the cost of promoting 50 per cent of these $1,000 clerks in second-class offices at (see p. 43, Hearings) 85,000

This leaves a net balance of the proposed appropriation available for the appointment of additional clerks after July 1, 1910, amounting to 235,000

33,900,000

This sum of $235,000 would only provide for the appointment of 392 additional clerks at $600 per annum if appointed for a full year on July 1, 1910.

In its estimates the department asked for 2,100 additional clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman should consider that it would require a great deal more than the appropriation here provided if all these clerks in the respective grades received the maximum allowance of those grades during the entire year. Take the case of the 2,120 clerks for whom provision is here made in the lowest class. They will not all be appointed on the 1st of July, the beginning of the fiscal year. They will be distributed throughout the year, and according to the computation of the clerk of the committee something of a little more than one-half of the total salary at the rate of $600 a year is estimated for that service.

Mr. OLCOTT. I still believe the gentleman has not made the full appropriation to employ these 296 clerks, plus those that were authorized—I think 1,473—during the last fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not question the fact that we have made ample provision by numbers for the employment of the 2,120 additional clerks during the coming year.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Can the gentleman state to the committee what percentage of the $1,100 clerks went into the $1,200 grade so far during this fiscal year?

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no direct question put to the First Assistant Postmaster-General during the hearing as to whether the full 50 per cent were promoted, but there was a general answer which led us to believe that the entire 50 per cent quota were promoted from the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Adding to the authorized 50 per cent the promotions that come to fill the vacancies by death and resignation, will the gentleman say that the promotion of the $1,100 men was over 50 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the department, following the liberal rule, provided more than 50 per cent.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is it not true that the number of men provided for in this bill, or the number of places, has not any real relation to the number of new clerks, but that that is governed entirely by the amount of money appropriated?

Mr. STAFFORD. By no means. The committee has adopted a new policy this year, the first time since we passed the classification act, limiting the total number of clerks and carriers that might be employed in the service during the fiscal year. We took that course because we found that under the estimates as presented by the department they were making calls for many more places than the service required. For instance, there would be at the end of the fiscal year from 1,500 to 1,700 places which there was no requirement for filling.

This year we thought, as a measure of economy and conformable to good business principles, that it would be well for us to limit the number, so that the department would not have that leeway that they could without any limitation at all appoint to the limit of appropriation. Instances were called to our attention where there had been a reduction of clerks in some post-offices, because their services were not required by the business, and we thought this was the only way whereby Congress could limit the number of clerks employed by limiting the total number, but nevertheless making provision for promotion under the automatic system.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If you provide, say, for 100 additional places in the $1,100 grade in addition to the places already appropriated for, when the promotion from the other grade is made, does not that interfere with the amount of money left to fill the places in the upper grades?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think if the gentleman would work this out with the care that the committee has worked it out, he will find that the places provided by the committee are adequate. I see that the gentleman has before him a carbon copy which is in the possession of numerous Members here, the authenticity of which I know nothing, but if he can give us any enlightenment on the subject in his own time, I will be glad to hear him and to reply to him.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will try to get some time to do that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, under the appropriation bill now, you provide for 47 more clerks in and below the $1,200 grade than is authorized in the current law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. MANN. And you increase the appropriation $1,991,500 for the appointment of clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is right; the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the number of clerks in the $600 grade will necessarily be more than the number specifically authorized in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that; that is the condition at the present time.

Mr. MANN. Last year we appropriated for 1,625. Now, under the form of the appropriation bill, the amount that can be actually used in the different grades depends somewhat on the appropriation. In other words, for the current fiscal year we did not make sufficient appropriation to employ all of these clerks that were authorized by number in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is correct; not for the full year.

Mr. MANN. Now, you authorize an additional appropriation of $1,991,800; that is equivalent to 3,318 new clerks at $600. So the effect of this bill is to provide or authorize 3,318 additional clerks at $600, so far as the $600 grade is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes that the new additional clerks are not put into the service at the beginning of the fiscal year, but they are distributed over the year as the exigencies of the service require, and therefore the amount of salary that will be needed is much less than the maximum amount.

Again, in the grades above, for instance in the $1,200, the $1,100, the $1,000, the $900, and the $800 grades, the clerks at the end of the next fiscal year will not have been receiving the maximum salary of those respective grades during the entire year, because promotions are going on at various periods of the year, and therefore it will not require a maximum amount as estimated under the plan of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but I simply wish to ascertain whether I am correct in my assumption.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman, in a general way, is correct.

Mr. MANN. That the increase of the appropriation, if used for the employment of $600 clerks, would provide for the employment of something over 3,300 clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not gone through the arithmetical problem of dividing 600 into the amount, but I presume the gentleman's figures are correct.

Mr. MANN. They are probably approximately correct. I wanted to get at the idea as to whether I was right in that assumption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of stations, clerks, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 9,007, at not exceeding $1,100 each.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just for an observation. There has been considerable criticism of this bill on the ground that it provided for an increase in the clerks in all of the post-offices of the first and second classes of only 47. That has been explained. I suppose the misapprehension has arisen largely through the segregation of these clerks into different classes, and the segregation which is mostly theoretical and not practical. I have no criticism to make of that, because I do not see how else it could be done. For instance, we provide in the current law for 6,961 $1,200 clerks, and in the present appropriation bill we provide for 10,345 $1,200 clerks. When I say we provide for that number I mean we provide for that number at not exceeding $1,200. That little phrase "not exceeding" is what has caused most of the trouble with the postal clerks throughout the country, I think. Of course the jump from 6,961 $1,200 clerks to 10,345 is a considerable jump, and while it is not 50 per cent of the number of clerks authorized, we are informed by the committee that it is 50 per cent of the number of clerks in the service at $1,200. In the $1,100 grade we have authorized for this year 7,815.

The bill carries for next year a jump to 9,007. Those two positions, the $1,100 and the $1,200 grades, carry all the increases in this bill. In the $1,000 grade there is a reduction from 6,000 to 5,450. In the $900 grade there is a reduction from 5,000 to 3,950, and in the $800 grade a reduction from 4,000 to 2,400. In the $600 grade there is a reduction from 1,625 to 296; and if that ended the story, there would be a proper criticism of this bill; but as we all know, these new clerks are not employed for the full length of the year, but if there is a sufficient increase to warrant the increase in the salaries now authorized by law and a sufficient increase of the appropriation to provide the additional clerks which may be needed, at salaries not exceeding $1,100 and $1,200, and so forth, that is all we ought to ask for. Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether, in his judgment, the increase that is now authorized of 47 clerks in this bill over that authorized by the current law, and whatever the number may be authorized over those new in the service, will be sufficient to properly take care of the postal service during the next fiscal year?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any doubt of it.

Mr. MANN. I have great respect for the opinion of the gentleman on such matters.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, and clerks in charge of stations, two hundred and ninety-six, at not exceeding $600 each.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, lines 6 and 7, amend by striking out the words "two hundred and ninety-six" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one thousand eight hundred," so as to read:

"Clerks, and clerks in charge of stations, one thousand eight hundred, at not exceeding $600 each."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have made a somewhat close examination of the conditions which prevail, and I have reached the conclusion that the provisions of this bill are not adequate to meet the conditions which are necessary to be met in the proper conduct of the Post-Office Department.

For some years it has been the practice in annual post-office appropriation bills to segregate in grades the clerks and officials in first and second class offices from the $600 grade to the $3,200 grade.

Each appropriation bill indicates a certain number of places or positions in each grade. But the number of places or positions specified in each grade is absolutely no guide to the actual number of clerks that may be employed at a given salary or grade at any time.

The language of each segregation or grade reads so many "at not exceeding." These words "at not exceeding" nullify the idea of a fixed number of clerks in any grade.

It is admitted by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee and by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in the debate that this is so. To assume that the total amount appropriated for clerks in first and second class offices is sufficient to employ a total number of clerks equal to the total number of places or positions mentioned in all the grades is a wrong conclusion.

In the so-called "automatic" grades, from $600 to $1,100 in first-class offices and from $600 to $1,000 in second-class offices, the promotions are provided for by law. The clerks move up one grade after serving one year in the next lower grade. They do not move up at the same time. A certain number move up at the beginning of each quarter in a year, according as the individual clerk finishes a year in the next lower grade. The result is that some of the clerks will be in two different grades during the course of a fiscal year.

The maximum number of places are specified in the bill for each of the automatic grades to make allowances for this constant changing, and manifestly at no time will the total number of clerks correspond with the total number of places in the bill.

To assume that it were possible for the total number of clerks in all grades to equal the total number of positions provided for in the bill would necessitate that each grade be appropriated for separately, which is not done. If each place or position indicated in the different grades in the pending bill were to be filled by a clerk at the indicated salary of each grade for the next fiscal year, it would cost $36,130,100, or $2,230,100 more than the total appropriation carried in the bill.

The number of places indicated for each grade in the bill means practically nothing. The total appropriation is the only guide to the number of clerks that may be employed. At the end of each fiscal year the actual number of clerks in the service never corresponds to the number of places carried in each annual bill, because the appropriation is never sufficient.

The chairman of the committee stated in his opening statement on the floor that on June 30, 1909, the department had available for appointment 973 clerks who were not appointed because the department did not have need for them. This statement is in error. The department could not have appointed this number of additional clerks, because the unexpended balance on account of clerks in first and second class post-offices for that fiscal year, ended June 30, 1909, was only $60,555.56, as shown in the annual report of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department. This sum would not have employed 100 additional clerks, to say nothing of 973 clerks.

For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1909, the appropriation bill provided a total of 31,048 places or positions in all grades. The department in its reports for the year ended June 30, 1909, shows only 29,930 clerks in the service.

The chairman of the committee assumed that the department had sufficient appropriation to carry as many clerks as there were places in the bill, namely, 31,048. The same condition existed for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908. The department only reported 28,220 clerks as actually employed. But the appropriation bill for that year specified a total of 29,312 so-called "places" in all the grades.

But there was no appropriation for such a number. The number of places specified in each grade is not the actual basis of calculation of the department is submitting its estimates.

Now, I beg to call the attention of the committee to this state of facts. The total appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices carried in the pending post-office appropriation bill amounts to $33,900,000.

This sum is $800,000 less than the estimates of the department for this purpose, and I take this information from page 43 of the hearings. The department estimates it will cost to pay the salaries of all clerks in all grades who will be in the service on June 30, 1910—at the end of the present fiscal year—during the next fiscal year commencing July 1, 1910, the sum of $32,345,000. This will leave a balance of the appropriation for all purposes for the next fiscal year commencing July 1, 1910, of $1,555,000.

To make the promotions provided for by law—successive promotion after one year of service in a grade up to $1,100 in first-class offices and up to $1,000 in second-class offices—will cost approximately $1,000,000. I take that from page 43 of the hearings.

According to the statement of Chairman WEEKS, the appropriation bill provides for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in first-class post-offices from $1,100 to $1,200 per annum and for the promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from $1,000 to $1,100 per annum.

The department estimates the cost of promoting 50 per cent of these $1,100 clerks in first-class offices at $235,000. It also estimates the cost of promoting 50 per cent of the $1,000 clerks in second-class offices at $85,000. This leaves a net balance of the proposed appropriation available for the appointment of additional clerks after July 1, 1910, of only $235,000.

This sum of $235,000 would only provide for the appointment of 392 additional, at $600 per annum, if appointed for a full year from July 1, 1910. In its estimates the department asked for 2,100 clerks, and I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that with only $235,000 available for the necessary promotions you can not furnish the number of clerks that will be required to conduct the business of the Post-Office Department in an efficient manner. Three hundred and ninety-two clerks are all that could under these circumstances be employed in the $600 grade, and 392 clerks are not enough to meet the conditions which are developing from day to day.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Post-Office Department in its estimates to the Treasury Department only estimated for 1,724 clerks, and yet before the Post-Office Committee it estimated for 2,100 clerks?

Mr. MADDEN. Whether they estimated for 2,100 clerks or 1,724 clerks, whatever the case may be, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are only appropriating at the maximum for 392 additional clerks at $600 per annum.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, will the gentleman yield in that connection? If the Post-Office Department, in making this estimate to the Secretary of the Treasury, estimated it was only necessary to have a little over 1,700 clerks, how does the gentleman account for the fact that when the officials of the department came before the committee they asked for 2,100 clerks? In which place was it right?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not undertake to account for what somebody else does. I have all I can do to account for my own actions. I certainly hope the committee will adopt the amendment I have introduced and which is now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] wish to be recognized?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes. If one were to judge by the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois he would conclude that the Post-Office Committee was deliberately trying to prevent sufficient force being provided to care for the service in the first and second class offices next year.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not think that.

Mr. WEEKS. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, the committee has very carefully been over all the facts and statements in this case, and, as I said in reply to a question from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I have no doubt that sufficient force and sufficient money have been provided for this service. The real facts of the matter are that during the past nine years the number of men employed in the Post-Office Department, while the work of the department has doubled and while the receipts of the department have doubled, has very much more than doubled.

There are more than twice as many carriers, about twice as many railway mail clerks, more than twice as many clerks in the first and second class post-offices than there were in the year 1900. During that period the pay of the clerks in the first and second class post-offices, from the year 1900, has increased between twenty-one and twenty-two millions of dollars. The average increase in the appropriation for the last eleven years has been $1,855,500. The increase for 1911 provided in this bill is $1,991,500. The number of clerks estimated for any particular year has been more than the requirements of the service. Last June there were 973 more clerks available than needed for the service. The department now estimates that on the 30th of June next there will be 1,473 more clerks provided for in 1910 than were required for the service this year. The same thing applies to the carrier service. The department this year estimates for the current year 1,500 carriers, besides carrying over 900 more than needed under the estimates for the current year. Now, the committee has reduced this number by 500 to 1,000 carriers, and I am informed that the department thinks that the committee has recommended too many carriers, and it could get on for the year with 500, plus the number carried over from the current year. In other words, the department has in some cases been estimating for more employees in the past than have been required. We have provided for 1,520 clerks in the first and second class, and, as I have said, provided more money than the average during the last eleven years. In reply to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], neither the committee nor the chairman of the committee has any doubt about having provided amply for this service.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has just stated that at the end of the last fiscal year there were 973 available which the department had authority to appoint. Can the gentleman tell the committee how it could have appointed these 973 clerks with only $60,000 of unexpended balance?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not remember the amount of the unexpended balance, but if there had been a requirement for clerks they could have been appointed at the end of the year, and it would not have required more than $60,000 if they had been appointed near the end of the year.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I understood the gentleman to say that the department estimated at the end of this fiscal year it would have authorized 1,400 clerks more than necessary.

Mr. WEEKS. One thousand four hundred and seventy-three.

Mr. MANN. How much of the money will they have left under the estimates of the $31,900,500 of the current fiscal appropriation?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think I have that amount; but it would revert to the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. It would not revert to the Treasury unless it was there to revert. In other words, if the appropriation was not available, they might have a great many more clerks authorized by law, but they could not employ them without making appropriation in connection with that authorization.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Taking the statement of the other gentleman from Illinois, he says that there would be money enough to pay 392 clerks the following year.

Mr. MADDEN. At $600 a year.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. In view of the fact that the average of these appointments are not more than six months' service, that means 784 might be appointed. There are 1,473 available to-day, so that the men available and the money to care for the pay are calculated up to June 30, 1911.

Mr. MANN. We are not talking about 1911; we are talking about June 30, 1910.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this fact. The average increase of appropriations for the past eleven years has been $1,855,500. The increase for the year 1911 is $1,991,500, or $136,000 more than the average for the past eleven years.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if the gentleman will pardon me, great stress has been laid upon the statement that, according to the estimates of the department, the department would have 1,400 clerks authorized at the end of the year which they have not employed.

Now, it is far more pertinent to know whether at that time they have any money with which to employ the clerks; because if their money is exhausted, of course they can not employ clerks. I take it that if the department can estimate that they will have 1,400 clerks authorized at the end of the year, not employed, by the same method by which they reach that estimate they will know how much money they will have left. I think the gentleman ought to get that information.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not need to get any more information to satisfy myself upon this subject. Let me give the gentleman from Illinois and the committee the method followed in making up this appropriation. The estimated annual rate June 30, 1910, is $32,345,000, which would include in the service all available clerks now provided for, including all those who will not be appointed during this year. The promotion of 50 per cent of the $1,100 clerks to the $1,200 grade would be $235,000. The promotion of 50 per cent of the clerks from the $1,000 grade to the $1,100 grade would require $85,000. The automatic promotions in all grades from $600 to $700 in first and second class post-offices would require $1,310,000. The 47 additional clerks other than those provided for would require $21,821, a total of $33,996,821. Deduct from that lapsed salaries and changed grades, which are the figures of the department, $310,000, and 10 per cent of the automatic promotions, $131,000, would leave $33,565,821 as the amount of money that will be required for all the clerks who will be available for appointment during the next year.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me again, the gentleman's figures are interesting and important; but if I can, I should like to get the other information. There are no automatic promotions, as I understand it, made between now and June 30.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Not by operation of law.

Mr. WEEKS. There may be the 1st of April.

Mr. MANN. The department knows what those are, of course. How many clerks are there now authorized but not employed?

Mr. WEEKS. The 1st of January there were 1,473, plus 450.

Mr. MANN. That was on the 1st of January. Does the gentleman know how many there are now?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that the department estimated that there would be something over 1,400 on the 1st of June.

Mr. WEEKS. They estimated that there would be 1,473 on the 1st of July.

Mr. MANN. The department must have made an estimate upon which they reached their conclusion as to the number of clerks who will still be unappointed on June 30. In making that estimate they must figure what they are paying clerks at present and the number of clerks who will be employed in certain grades. Certainly that information ought to be available.

Mr. WEEKS. That information is available in these figures: The estimated annual rate June 30, 1910, for all clerks in the service will be $32,245,000.

Mr. MANN. But the appropriation for this current year is $31,908,500. That would not look as though they could employ very many of the $1,400 clerks if they wanted to.

Mr. WEEKS. There was not any suggestion on the part of the post-office officials who appeared before the Post-Office Committee that there was not ample money to provide for all the clerks authorized under the bill for the current year. I want further to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that in making the estimate which has already been called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], in making the estimate to the Secretary of the Treasury, the department estimated for 1,724 clerks for next year. In estimating to the committee they estimated for 2,100 clerks, and the figure on which they based the annual rate, June 30, 1910, was exactly the same in both cases.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman perfectly well satisfied that there is a sufficient appropriation for the current fiscal year to employ all or any portion of these one thousand four hundred and odd clerks authorized, but not emplyoed, for each department in which they were necessary?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the need of these clerks is not shown by the fact that in a very large number of the cities of the country there is a general complaint that clerks are overworked and that the department has responded that it was unable to supply additional clerks?

Mr. WEEKS. I think the gentleman from Nebraska is entirely wrong in his premises. I know that complaints are made that clerks were overworked, but on investigation I do not find any such condition. I do not mean to say that clerks in certain instances do not work overtime, that there are not clerks in the distributing department in the large offices who do work overtime, sometimes more and sometimes less, but I do mean to say that it is the policy of the department to work clerks in the first and second class offices eight hours a day as nearly as they can do it, and when requisitions have been made during the last six months the requests are granted if the inspector thinks they are needed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The gentleman made a point of order against an amendment to the bill preventing the working of clerks overtime, and it seems to me, in view of the fact that the restriction is removed, there should be an abundant supply of cheap clerks, so that the department may, with the growth of business in the cities, permit the introduction of additional clerks in the great post-offices.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no doubt that there are sufficient clerks for the purpose. I have investigated several post-offices, have obtained the number of hours that the clerks work in those offices, and I do not think that anybody need be disturbed by clerks working overtime in the average post-office.

[The time of Mr. WEEKS having expired, his time was extended five minutes by unanimous consent.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee during the progress of this bill should find that he was in error in his computation—because there are several gentlemen here that think that he is—would there be any objection on his part at any time the error was palpably demonstrated to increasing the amount to a sum sufficient to provide for the clerks that are authorized by the bill?

Mr. WEEKS. I would not hesitate a moment to do that.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman has stated that he has investigated the conditions in the large offices. I desire to ask him whether he has investigated the conditions that exist in the Chicago post-office?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The postmaster of that city was here a few days ago and demanded, or requested, additional help. I wish to say that I have been in the post-office myself, and I was surprised to see how hard these clerks have to work. I have never seen a government clerk in any department work as hard as the employees work in our post-office.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Illinois states that the postmaster of Chicago has been here for some days. He did request additional help, and I understand was allowed 100 additional clerks, notwithstanding the fact that during the first six months of the fiscal year the average time the clerks were employed in that post-office was eight hours and nine minutes. Excepting the month of December, the heaviest month of the year, they worked on an average eight hours and three minutes a day.

Mr. SABATH. The work is increasing in our city day by day.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KELIHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is willing to assure the committee that the amount carried in this item is adequate to provide for the promotion from the fifth to the sixth grade in the first-class offices 50 per cent of the eligibles, and also 50 per cent in the second class?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no doubt that the provision is ample.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to what the able chairman of the committee has already said in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do not believe that this amendment ought to obtain. In the first place, I do not believe that this additional number of clerks is necessary. I want to assure this committee that if I believed for one moment that these clerks embraced in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois were necessary in order to promote the efficiency of the administration of the postal service I would unhesitatingly support it. I am interested in economy in the administration of the affairs of the Government, I am interested in economy so far as the post-office is concerned, but I do not believe in carrying economy to the extent of destroying the efficiency of the service. I have heard it stated in the last four or five days time and again upon this side of the House, and time and again upon that side of the House that what the post-office needs is a good business administration. As yet, I have not heard anyone offer any concrete propositions as to what they believe would be a good business administration, but I put it up to every member of this committee in all candor and sincerity whether or not it is a good business administration to tie onto the post-office appropriation bill a large number of clerks that it is admitted are not necessary? [Applause.]

Why do you propose to run your arm into the Treasury of the United States and take out of it millions of dollars to pay to a class of people whose services are not needed in the efficient administration of postal affairs? A few days ago the President of the United States sent a message to Congress in which he recommended an increase of pay in all second-class postage for the purpose of wiping out the postal deficit. I ask you again, How do you propose to obliterate the deficit by continuing to add employees to this department whose services are not necessary?

Mr. Chairman, during the remainder of my time I ask to have read at the desk an editorial which appeared in the Indianapolis News of February 10, 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

REGULAR BILLION-DOLLAR SESSION.

[From the Indianapolis News, February 10, 1910.]

We had much talk and loud talk last fall, and even after Congress met, about the retrenchment policy of the administration and the prospective economy of Congress, but an experienced public was inclined to take it all with at least a grain of salt. If there was really to be economy, so much the better, but if there was not—well, extravagance was to be expected, and there was nothing to do but to grin and bear it until next November. The people generally expect nothing in the way of economy, and they are not likely to be disappointed.

It was, of course, encouraging to learn that the President was requiring all the departments to cut their estimates to the bone; it was fine to hear that there was to be no river and harbor, and, perhaps, no public building bill, and it was interesting to hear Mr. TAWNEY eloquently set forth his programme of national economy. But by the time the departmental estimates have gone through the congressional mill they are just about as big as ever. Instead of there being no river and harbor bill, the committee has now framed one that carries some $40,000,000, and doubtless a public building bill of liberal scope is still to come. The President's efforts and the labor of the department heads, like the eloquence of Mr. TAWNEY, have been wasted, and the people's money will continue to be wasted as heretofore. Even the free-seed graft, amounting to over $300,000 for the purchase of seeds, to say nothing of the expense of their distribution, has gone through unscathed.

And why, good sooth, should the public expect anything else? The old guard, which is to say the old gang, is still in control. The people have stood for this sort of thing often before, so why not again? But there is an end to all patience, even of the people's patience, and there are signs everywhere that the people are tired of having their money used as if it did not cost anything; they are tired of official extravagance; they are tired of the extortionate tariff; they are, in fact, tired of everything that has saddled on them the present enormous cost of living, and they are especially tired of the men responsible for it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] contemplates an addition of about 1,600 places of the $600 class. The committee authorizes or recommends to the House the appointment of 296 clerks for this grade. I am free to say, and I think a great many members of the committee will also say, that they are unable to understand the reasons that are offered for this great reduction in the number of clerks in that grade. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], a very active and hard-working member of the committee, attempted to shed light on this proposition, but he in his guilelessness and innocence seems to think that so long as an appropriation bill names a number of places that that is sufficient. He does not seem to realize that it takes money to pay clerks and carriers, and that unless the money is carried in the bill the clerks and the carriers, of course, will not be appointed, because they can not be paid. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is a great man, of course, but he can not make 269 men do the work of 1,600 men any more than anybody else can. Of course, you can economize by refusing to appropriate money. You can economize by refusing to pay salaries, but this is not true economy. This service is being paid for by the people of the country. Every man who uses the postal service pays for it. He is entitled to have his work done. The experience of years shows us that a certain number of increases in the various branches of the Government are necessary. Now, these gentlemen make a drastic reduction. They come in here with a very radical proposition, and it is one of the few radical propositions that I do not agree with. They do not support it with any reason that appeals to me, and I have tried my best to find the reason for it by questioning the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. Neither of them seems to know whether or not there is money appropriated and now available to enable the department to fill the places which they say they have failed to fill heretofore.

I got some information from the committee this morning, and it would seem to show that the Post-Office Department, for some reason or other, failed to fill what places they might have filled under the current bill, and that if they make appointments at the same ratio this year as they have in the past, there will be something like 972 places unfilled at the end of the present fiscal year. The chairman of the committee is evidently assuming that those places can be filled and those in addition to the small number authorized will be sufficient, but nobody seems to know whether there is money to pay those men if those places are filled. It seems very strange indeed that such a condition of doubt and misunderstanding on an important matter like this should exist in this committee, and it does exist. I contend that there has not been a sufficient explanation of this cut; that there has not been given any good reason why we should instead of appropriating for and authorizing 1,600 or 1,800 places authorize only 269, and take the chance of crippling the postal service.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey), there were—ayes 41, noes 69.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 50, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $33,900,000.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, lines 9 and 10, amend by striking out the words "thirty-three million nine hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-four million seven hundred thousand," so as to read "In all, $34,700,000."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendment close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment close in ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would say in regard to the amendment I have offered, that in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] in response to a question asked by my colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET], that I have no particular desire to press the amendment now. I still believe that the appropriation is not sufficient to provide for the 296 clerks, plus the 1,473 which were left over, and I merely wanted to save my rights by offering the amendment at this time. I am perfectly willing to have the matter go over until such time as may be convenient to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman withdraw his amendment at this time.

Mr. OLCOTT. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment at this time providing that after further satisfying myself——

Mr. WEEKS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask for a vote on the amendment if that is the position of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum, and the assignment of the several grades of compensation to the various offices shall be made, so far as practicable, in proportion to the amount of business transacted through such offices and the respective divisions thereof, and that the total number of clerks and employees in the service June 30, 1911, shall not exceed 33,200.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman what possible service this can be in the first place? The law would not permit the Postmaster-General to employ more clerks than are authorized in this act, I take it, and if he does employ more he violates the law and renders himself amenable to discipline, and I have not the slightest idea in the world he will do that. That is one question I direct to the attention of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin. In the second place, the law now provides for automatic promotions up to the $1,100 grade, and provides that in such a way that if a man is not promoted he is not entitled to bring a claim in the Court of Claims. In other words, while Congress in the law contemplates that every efficient clerk in the Post-Office Department shall receive his annual increase from $600 up to $1,100, if he does not receive that, there is no way in which he can enforce it, and yet in the face of that it is proposed to provide that the department may not give it to him, may not follow the law as it exists if it creates a deficiency. It was the intention of Congress to provide that every efficient post-office clerk, every efficient post-office carrier in the other provisions, should receive his annual increase of salary up to the $1,000 and $1,100 grade, according to what office he was in, and yet that provision of the law is rendered nugatory by this limitation if the appropriation does not happen to be sufficient. Now, the distinguished chairman of the committee says that this appropriation will be sufficient, and the Committee of the Whole House just voted down an amendment to increase the appropriation, on the supposition that the appropriation carried in this bill is sufficient to provide these automatic promotions. If that is so, I can see no reason for following that appropriation with an express provision that the automatic promotion shall not be provided if the appropriation is not sufficient, and I ask for enlightenment from my distinguished friend from Milwaukee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chariman, I wish to take exception to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. Of course, that goes without saying.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Particularly on post-office matters, because the gentleman has already demonstrated that he has been in error in some instances——

Mr. MANN. Well, I have been correct about my figures, and that is more than the gentleman from Wisconsin can say this afternoon.

Mr. STAFFORD. The "gentleman from Wisconsin" does not even accept the statement as far as figures are concerned, because if I have a pride in anything I have pride in my figures.

A clerk under the automatic scheme of promotion, if the department authorizes a promotion, would have a claim in the Court of Claims for the increase allowed regardless of the amount of appropriation. Following the law that was passed four years ago, the clerks in the various grades would be entitled to recover in the Court of Claims if their promotion had been sanctioned by the department and no deficiency or adequate appropriation had been made.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I will not quarrel about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, as to the——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman remembers, of course, that he is talking in my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I will not disagree about immaterial questions. Of course, if the department allows the increase, the man can recover it; but the department is not obliged to allow the increase under the automatic promotion, and, if this provision goes in, would not be permitted to allow it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, that this provision, in its main features, has been carried in former appropriations, and in no instance has any clerk been deprived of the automatic promotion as provided by the law which we passed four years ago.

Now, coming to the question as to the purpose of the new limitation, that restricts the total number of clerks that may be employed in any one fiscal year, in which we state they shall not exceed 33,200. That is for the purpose of Congress having some control as to the number of additional men that may be employed in the service during the fiscal year. As I stated in my prior remarks, instances have been called to our attention where there were in some post-offices more clerks than there were needed, and the Post-Office Department, when those facts have been presented, have reduced the number of clerks allowed.

Now, the committee and Congress should have some control as to the number that may be employed, because there may be times when Congress might feel that it is necessary to restrict the discretion of the department, and that is the main purpose of that limitation. As far as the other provision of the paragraph is concerned, that has been carried for years in the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about its having been carried for years. If he means to convey the idea that it has been in there very long, I will say that we only commenced to make appropriations a very short time ago, and this item was put in after we commenced to do that.

Let me ask the gentleman one further question. In this appropriation bill you authorize the appointment of how many clerks altogether?

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the question?

Mr. MANN. In this appropriation bill you authorize the appointment of how many clerks altogether?

Mr. STAFFORD. Thirty-three thousand two hundred.

Mr. MANN. How does it increase the authority of that by saying we mean 33,200? What good does it do to say a thing to a department officer twice, if he can not understand it the first time? Do you have to bore a hole in his head with a gimlet to let him know the second time?

Mr. STAFFORD. There have been some instances where surplusage would not be out of place; where, by repeating, Congress would reenforce the expressed will. But the committee is proceeding on a new line in this bill. They realize that since the classification act has been established Congress has not control over the appropriation and of the number of men that may be required in the various grades from $1,200 down to $600 as before the classification act. Next year we might make a lump-sum appropriation, because under the law providing for automatic promotions Congress has lost the control, and we follow the recommendations of the department in providing for the promotions of all those clerks who have conformed to the efficiency test.

So I think this provision should be carried in the bill, even though there is some surplusage in the declaration of restriction.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this provision were not in the law; how many clerks could you have?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not more than 3,200.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of repeating it in this provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. As I have stated, we are proceeding on a new line, and hence we propose to limit the total number that may be employed.

Mr. MANN. If the committee do not make any such provision as that, the Committee of the Whole would, perhaps, "But sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It is not sufficient for the committee in explaining an item in the bill to say that it is a new line. I will say to my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, that there must be some reason given for a surplus on a given subject when the committee are considering this line in the bill, and say that it means nothing in itself, if you can not explain what it is, and what it means, I am suspicious of it.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. May I say to the gentleman, that in the post-office establishment previously, that department might create any deficit that it saw fit, to be made up by the Appropriation Committee?

Mr. MANN. Only by the automatic promotions and only by appointing men authorized by the bill.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; they could, if there is no limitation there. If the bill does not provide that the expenditure shall be no greater than the bill there is no restraint upon the appointments. If the bill does not provide the number shall be limited, appointments may be made in the last month of the year, and you could carry these men over as clerks on the roll the year following.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to contend that if Congress authorizes 3,200 clerks of any particular class, that that department can appoint more than 3,200 in that class?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I mean to say that if there is a number of promotions provided for, and if there is no limitation placed there, they can appoint any number and create any deficit without a violation of the law.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey a question, as to these 10,345 clerks of the $1,200 class. Does the gentleman contend that if this bill passes the department can appoint more than 10,345 of the $1,200 grade?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Where is the law to prevent it?

Mr. MANN. Where is the law to authorize it?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It does not require it.

Mr. MANN. But the department can not appoint, surely, without authority.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The habit was to create a deficit until the provision to which the gentleman is now objecting was inserted in the law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I am not going to argue the question that when we provide that a department can appoint 10 clerks of a certain class that the department can appoint 20. That is too elementary.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If there is not a limit in the bill, and the gentleman knows it from the former practice.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know perfectly well, and I am willing to stake my judgment and reputation upon the proposition, that when Congress provides that a certain department can appoint a certain number of clerks for any purpose that the department can not appoint any more than that number.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Congress does not so provide without the limitation. It provides for the money. It is not a limitation, and never was held so.

Mr. PAYNE. These $1,200 clerks provided for by the bill are made so by promotion.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And that is automatically provided by law?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And the promotion is given under this law because of length of service of the men, and if there are more than the number at $1,200 the law authorizes them, does it?

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the $1,200 class. There are no automatic promotions of the $1,200 class.

Mr. PAYNE. Take the lower class.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Take the $1,100 class.

Mr. PAYNE. I only wanted to see if this was necessary.

Mr. MANN. If you take the $1,100 clerks, the men of the $1,000 grade would be entitled to receive promotion, but might not receive the promotion. If this provision is in, they would receive it, and they could create a deficiency.

Mr. PAYNE. And there was an increased number of clerks to the number provided for?

Mr. MANN. By increasing the number to the number provided for.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I can see a reason for having this limitation there.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am trying to ascertain, whether it is put there for the purpose of interfering with the automatic promotion law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, no.

Mr. MANN. If that is the provision, as the gentleman from New York now says, and as his colleague on the Post-Office Committee [Mr. FASSETT] said a moment ago——

Mr. FASSETT. Nobody said that.

Mr. MANN. I am glad to have the gentleman say he did not say it.

Mr. STAFFORD. That limitation was placed there so as to limit the maximum number of clerks that would be employed in the next fiscal year. The total number might be increased in the $600 grade. We might have provided for 1,800 instead of 296, and yet the limitation of 33,200 would be applicable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would this limitation of the number of clerks that many be in the service on the 30th of June apply to any other day in the year?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the phraseology it would not apply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where it says that the total number in the service June 30, 1911, shall not exceed so many?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would apply only to the number in the service on June 30, 1911.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. If it should happen that there were promotions into the $1,100 class more than appropriated for in this bill, I understand that the promotions would be made, although it would increase that number; but if this limitation was there it would limit the appointment of $600 clerks, so that the aggregate would not exceed this number of 33,200.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That would be the effect of the operation of it.

Mr. PAYNE. So it would not cut off any promotion, but would cut off the appointing of additional clerks in the $600 class; but instead of that they would have clerks in the higher grades corresponding with the number appropriated for in your bill, and corresponding with the number of this limitation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It would operate that way. I want to repeat that in the absence of both provisos the department could, if it would, create any deficit that it might elect. The first one prevents that. In the absence of the second proviso it could appoint all the clerks that it is authorized to appoint, on the last day in that year. That would multiply by six the number over what it would be if they were appointed in the middle month of the year, and carry six times the number to the permanent roll, to be appropriated for the next year, that might be carried there with the proviso in.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who I am proud to follow, to this fact. He asked me a moment ago if more clerks in the $1,100 class could be appointed under the automatic promotion than are provided for here. More clerks could be promoted under the automatic promotion than the number named for the $1,100 class here, but not more than the total provided in this bill; nor can more clerks be appointed in any class than the number provided in this bill. The number provided in this bill is not indicated by the number specified for a particular class, because in all of these cases it says "not exceeding" so much salary. It says ten thousand and some clerks, at not exceeding $1,200. A lot of those may be in the $1,100 grade. They are not required to be in the $1,200 grade. There is no automatic promotion to the $1,200 grade.

I lay it down as a fundamental proposition that when Congress appropriates for a certain number of clerks in a certain department, the department can not employ more clerks unless specifically authorized to do so, and this is already a limitation as to the number.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose the department should go to work on the 1st day of July next, after this bill goes into effect, and appoint the full number of $600 clerks provided for in this bill, and afterwards these automatic promotions should go on. Would you not then have more than were appropriated for in the bill, and would it not be lawful from beginning to end, under these provisions already in the bill, aside from this provision?

Mr. MANN. Whether there is a sufficient amount of money appropriated is another proposition. But the department will not authorize all of the $600 clerks at the beginning of the year, and none of these $600 clerks would receive any promotion during the year.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose at the end of six months they have the full complement of $600 clerks and then the promotion was to go on.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to ask the chairman of the committee; that is one of the mysteries that no one on the floor can solve.

Mr. PAYNE. That would be entirely lawful without the proviso which the committee has put in.

Mr. MANN. That is an assumption that the department is going to do something wrong.

Mr. PAYNE. It may be that there will be a press of business.

Mr. MANN. Then if there is, we ought to provide for it. If you assume that the department is going to do something wrong, I am just as much warranted that they will do something wrong against promoting these clerks as that they will appoint a lot of clerks not needed. I will not assume that they will do anything wrong in either case.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman's position is that we should provide for clerks by the wholesale in anticipation that there may be something happen in the future.

Mr. MANN. Oh, my friend is sometimes very happy in stating his own position, but he is never happy in stating mine.

Mr. FASSETT. It is enough to make anybody unhappy to do that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this is a limitation upon the number of appointments and is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph naturally divides itself into three parts: First, there is a limitation on the amount to be expended; second, there is a limitation on the assignment of clerks according to the amount of business; and the last, on the number of clerks that may be employed. The phraseology indicates that in all three parts it is a limitation. It is a limitation on the expenditure, a limitation on the assignment of clerks according to postal business, and a limit on the number of clerks that may be appointed during the fiscal year. There is no other construction, it seems to me, that can be given to the phraseology, except that the various matters are limitations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the Postmaster-General, without this limitation, authority to assign these clerks to places in the offices?

Mr. STAFFORD. He might have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has he authority to assign the clerks to places in the various offices without this provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. He has.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, this is a limitation on his discretion and clearly in violation of the rule. If it is a limitation on the discretion of an official, it is clearly in violation of the rule.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, my understanding of this matter—and it is difficult to understand a great many things in connection with this bill—but I have made some investigation of this particular point, and I understand the Postmaster-General has the authority to employ clerks and carriers and other officials. If he has the right now at this time to employ more than 33,200, and I think he has, then this attempt in an appropriation bill to limit his authority to employ more than 33,200 is clearly new legislation and subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. This provision, in the opinion of the Chair, is not a limit on the appropriation, but a limit on the official functions of an executive officer, and it has been ruled over and over again that that is not proper in a general appropriation bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I present a statement of the managers on the part of the House and the conference report on bill H. R. 14464, making appropriations for the District of Columbia, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911.

The conference report (No. 663) and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14464) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 8, 12, 15, 16, 19, 20, 34, 35, 39, 40, 45, 48, 49, 50, 59, 64, 65, 81, 85, 86, 87, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 117, 125, 126, 130, 140, 141, 142, 143, 147, 155, 156, 158, 166, 170, 171, 175, 182, 183, 184, 185, 187, 195, 197, 198, 199, 213, 215, 216, 217, and 218.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 9, 10, 11, 17, 18, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 42, 43, 46, 47, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 63, 66, 69, 70, 72, 73, 77, 79, 80, 82, 84, 89, 90, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 113, 114, 115, 121, 122, 123, 124, 128, 129, 131, 136, 138, 139, 146, 148, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 157, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167, 169, 179, 180, 181, 186, 188, 192, 202, 203, 204, 205, 208, 209, 210, 212, 214, 220, 223, 224, 225, and 226; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "storekeeper, eight hundred dollars; messenger, six hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "one thousand eight hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "chief clerk, one thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and nine thousand seven hundred and seventy-six dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "twenty-one thousand seven hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"For extra labor in the preparation of tax-sale certificates, with authority to employ clerks, eight hundred dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "thirty-nine thousand four hundred and forty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That hereafter no illustrations shall be used in the annual report of any department of the government of the District of Columbia;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, after the word "necessary," insert the following: "to be immediately available;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 22 of the bill, in line 23, after the word "clerks," strike out the words "of the auditor's and other offices after office hours;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Northeast: Monroe street, Thirteenth to Fifteenth street, grade and improve, four thousand dollars; and the City and Suburban Railway of Washington be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to remove its double tracks from Michigan avenue from the intersection thereof with Monroe street NE. eastwardly to the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and to extend its double tracks on Monroe street NE. eastwardly from said intersection and over the Monroe Street Bridge to Twelfth street NE., thence on Twelfth street northwardly to the Bunker Hill road, and thence northwardly on such street or road as may be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the intersection of such street or road with the boundary line of the District of Columbia.

"The removal of existing tracks east of the intersection of Monroe street and Michigan avenue and the extension of the new double tracks on Monroe street as far as Twelfth street NE., as herein provided for, shall be completed within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; that the construction of that portion of the extension from Twelfth and Monroe streets to the Bunker Hill road, as herein provided for, shall be commenced within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and completed within six months from the commencement of construction operations; that the construction of that portion of the extension from the Bunker Hill road to the District line, herein provided for shall be commenced within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and completed within one year from the commencement of construction operations; that the cost of widening the roadway of Monroe street NE., between Tenth and Twelfth streets, to make the same forty feet wide from curb to curb, shall be paid by the City and Suburban Railway of Washington; and in default of such commencements and completions within the several periods specified herein all rights, franchises, and privileges granted herein shall, with respect to the defaulted portions of the route or routes, cease and determine.

"The said City and Suburban Railway of Washington shall have, over and respecting the routes herein provided for, the same rights, powers, privileges, duties, and obligations as it has, and hereafter may have, by law over and respecting its present route, and shall be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of its charter and of law.

"The City and Suburban Railway of Washington is hereby authorized to operate over its tracks cars for the conveyance of parcels, milk, ice, light freight, and of fuel for the use of such company: Provided, That fuel cars shall be operated only during the hours between twelve o'clock midnight and five o'clock antemeridian, and shall be subject to such regulations as may be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: After the matter inserted by said amendment, insert as separate paragraphs the following:

"Southeast: Fourteenth street, U to V streets, pave thirty-four feet wide, seven thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars;

"Northwest: For additional amount to widen Thirteenth street extended ten feet on the easterly side between Park road and Monroe street, three hundred dollars, to be immediately available; and no assessment shall be made against or collected of adjacent property owners in consequence of the widening, grading, and improving of said street;"

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 6 of said amendment, after the word "Vernon," strike out the word "avenue" and insert in lieu thereof the word "street;" and in line 8 of said amendment, after the word "Vernon," strike out the word "avenue" and insert in lieu thereof the word "street;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "eighty-nine thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 67: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 67, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose said amendment and insert the same on page 33 of the bill, between lines 21 and 22; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 68: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and ten thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended as follows: On page 36, in line 3 of the bill, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 74 and 75: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 74 and 75, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out said amendments and strike out the amended paragraph, being lines 11 to 13, inclusive, page 37 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert before the amended paragraph the word "playgrounds;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 78: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The public-convenience station appropriated for in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and ten, approved March third, nineteen hundred and nine, to be located under the sidewalk on the east side of Ninth street NW., between F and G streets, shall be located under the sidewalk and under such portion of the public reservation adjoining such sidewalk as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem necessary for said purpose; and the jurisdiction and control over such portion of said reservation as may be selected by said commissioners for said purpose is hereby transferred from the United States official having charge of said reservation to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, such transfer to take effect on the date of notice by said commissioners to the said United States official of the portion of said reservation so selected.

"For one underground public-convenience station to be located in Dupont circle, to be immediately available, fourteen thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the jurisdiction and control over such portion of Dupont circle as may be selected by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the location of such station and its approaches is hereby transferred from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; such transfer to take effect on the date of notice by the commissioners to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, of the portion of Dupont circle so selected.

"And the authority granted in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year nineteen hundred and ten, approved March third, nineteen hundred and nine, for the location of a public-convenience station on the triangle west of Dupont circle, between Twentieth and P streets and Massachusetts avenue, is hereby revoked, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to enter into a supplemental contract with the contractor for erecting said convenience station, providing for the abandonment of further work of construction, for removing construction work already done by him, for replacing said triangle in the condition which existed prior to beginning the construction of said station, and for the construction of the underground public-convenience station in Dupont circle. The balance of the appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars for the station on the triangle west of Dupont circle is hereby made available for this purpose, in addition to the fourteen thousand dollars herein appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters to be placed on the water services of the Government Printing Office, the United States Navy-Yard, the United States Capitol building, the House and Senate office buildings, and the district building, said meters to be purchased, installed, maintained, and to remain under the observation and control of the officer in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, with the exception of the meter to be placed on the water service of the district building, which shall be purchased, installed, maintained, and be under the observation and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, fourteen thousand dollars."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 88: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "one thousand seven hundred and thirty-four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 91: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And provided further, That teachers now employed in the normal, high, and manual-training schools, or hereafter to be appointed from without the District of Columbia in the said normal, high, or manual-training schools, may be placed in Group A, class 6, and receive their longevity increase according to their previous number of years of experience in accredited normal, high, or manual-training schools."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 109: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 109, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "three hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 110: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "seventeen thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 111: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one thousand eight hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 112: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one thousand eight hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 116: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "one hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 118: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixteen thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 119: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 119, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "thirteen thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 120: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 120, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 127: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "sixty-seven thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 132: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "not exceeding eight thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 133: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 133, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For the construction of an eight-room building for Randle Highlands, D. C., to be erected on a suitable site to be donated of not less than one acre of ground, the location thereof to be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, sixty-four thousand dollars." WASHINGTON GARDNER,
E. L. TAYLOR, JR.,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 18586. An act amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6271. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 2072. An act for the relief of John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan;

S. 4672. An act for the relief of William Keyes; and
S. 2445. An act for the relief of Peter Fleming.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 18586. An act amending sections 246 and 247, Revised Statutes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4446. An act to give the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power in regard to the improvement of the post-office and court-house at Wilmington, Del.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 6168. An act creating a government business-methods commission—to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRICE OF FOOD PURCHASED BY UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report (No. 665), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 408.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to furnish to the House of Representatives a table showing the prices paid by vessels of the United States Navy during 1909 in United States and foreign ports for the following-named supplies, to wit: Beef, corned beef, veal, pork, bacon, ham, fowl, ice, eggs, milk, bread, potatoes, and fruit.

With the following amendment:

Line 1, after "navy," insert "if not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that, may I ask him what is the object of putting in that provision, "if not incompatible with the public interests?"

Mr. FOSS. It is a usual provision, I will say, in all resolutions of inquiry.

Mr. MANN. It is usual in addressing the President and is usual in addressing the State Department on diplomatic matters, but if my recollection serves me right, it is not the usual form in addressing an ordinary department asking for information. We direct the department to send us information. We determine whether we want it or not, where it does not affect our diplomatic relations, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that amendment.

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that it has always been customary, as far as the Committee on Naval Affairs is concerned, to insert those words in every resolution of inquiry, and has been for a great many years.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman it certainly is not the custom of the House to put those words in, and the Senate is extremely particular about striking them out.

Mr. FASSETT. It may well be that in certain lines of inquiry that saving clause ought to be inserted, as, for instance, if a committee of this House should want to know the plans of a battle ship or the details of some patented weapon or powder. In that case it might be well enough to insert the saving clause.

Mr. MANN. Certainly there are cases where it is justifiable, but where we want simply some plain information which the department has, it does not seem to me dignified for the House to insert that saving clause when directing information to be sent here which it knows the department has and of which we can judge just as well as the department as to whether it is incompatible with the public interests.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, we took leave of our dignity the other night.

Mr. MANN. Then we ought to reassert it now.

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection to those words going out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I now move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this part and parcel of the inquiry into the high cost of living?

Mr. FOSS. No; the resolution was offered by a Member of the House asking for information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I just wanted to know what the reason was.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know what the reason is. The reason is in the mind of the introducer of the resolution. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

GUN CONTRACTS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I now present the following privileged report (No. 664), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 410.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following information, to wit:

(a) What contracts, if any, have been made since July 1, 1909, for 12-inch, 7-inch, 6-inch, and 5-inch guns for the navy.

(b) The firm or firms with which said contracts have been made.

(c) The price agreed to be paid to each firm for each gun of the above-mentioned caliber.

(d) The number of each caliber of guns contracted for with each firm and the total amount of these contracts with each firm.

With the following amendment:

Line 1, after "navy," insert "if not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist on the amendment, "if not incompatible with the public interests." We have a statement about these contracts before the Committee on Appropriations, except that we have not the definite information called for by this resolution. If the department were to take the extraordinary position that it is incompatible with public interests to furnish this information it would lead to a very peculiar situation, since we wish to get the official information from the department before acting upon certain matters. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

On motion of Mr. WEEKS (at 5 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation for purchase of storage shed at Mare Island Navy-Yard (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INTERSTATE BUSINESS BY TELEGRAPHERS.

Mr. SMOOT. On February 24 the Vice-President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 28, 1908, a supplemental report showing the results of an investigation made by the Bureau of Labor into the telephone companies engaged in the conduct of interstate business as to their methods of business, wages paid, and so forth. Accompanying the communication were illustrations, which can not be printed without authorization from the Senate. I move that the illustrations be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19278) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 to the bill (H. R. 18681) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 5 to the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 2072. An act for the relief of John Reed, alias Michael Flanagan;

S. 2445. An act for the relief of Peter Fleming; and

S. 4672. An act for the relief of William Keyes.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to create a court of commerce and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of the so-called "eight-hour bill," which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. JONES. I present resolutions unanimously adopted at the tristate meeting of Idaho, Oregon, and Washington of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, held at Walla Walla, Wash., January 17, 18, 19, 1910, relative to the parcels-post bill. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the tristate meeting of Idaho, Oregon, and Washington of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, held at Walla Walla, Wash., January 17, 18, and 19, 1910:

Resolved, That we demand the establishment of a parcels-post system and emphatically oppose any curtailment of the present Rural Free Delivery Service or the increase of postage rates on magazines.

Resolved, That we favor and demand the submission of an amendment to the National Constitution providing for a graduated income tax.

Resolved, That we favor and demand the submission of an amendment to the National Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Resolved, That under existing conditions the revision of the tariff upward necessarily involved a revision of the standard of living downward, and we therefore favor and demand a lowering of the tariff duties on the necessities of life in accordance with the pledges of both the leading political parties.

Resolved, That gambling in futures on farm products disturbs the natural law of supply and demand to the injury of both the producer and consumers, and we therefore demand the enactment of legislation to prohibit such gambling in futures.

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the ship subsidies.

Resolved, That we favor a wise and practical conservation of our national resources, and that we expect our Congressmen to urge and support such measures as will protect the people against any private exploitation of public wealth that will deprive the people of it, without sufficient consideration or proper control.

Resolved, That we emphatically protest against any action by the Navy Department to prevent vessels carrying coal for the use of the navy from taking cargoes of wheat or other grain on their return voyage.

Resolved, That we believe the report of the Country Life Commission appointed by President Roosevelt to be the most important document ever issued in behalf of agriculture, and we respectfully petition Congress to authorize the publication of this report as a public document in sufficient quantity to supply every farmer who may ask for it.

Resolved, That in the matter of the readjustment of postal revenues and postal expenditures we recommend that, instead of confining investigation to the matter of periodicals alone, Congress take up the cost of transportation and the whole question of revenues from whatever source derived.

L. C. CROW, State President.
F. A. SIKES, Chairman.
WM. GOODYEAR, Secretary.
GEO. L. REID.

He also presented a petition of Local Council No. 905, Knights of Columbus, of San Bernardino, Cal., and a petition of Local Council No. 840, Knights of Columbus, of Fresno, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the admission of publications of fraternal societies to the mails as second-class matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 862) to reimburse John G. Foster and Horace M. Sanford, reported it adversely, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6093) providing for the granting and patenting to the State of Utah desert lands formerly in the Uinta Indian Reservation in Utah, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6643) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Park City, Utah, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 306) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6382) to provide buildings for the departments of State,

Justice, and Commerce and Labor, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 305) thereon.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5121) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 304) thereon.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 181) granting to the State of South Dakota a certain amount of land in lieu of a like amount of land heretofore granted to the State and subsequently appropriated by the United States for forest-reservation purposes, and for other purposes, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely, as the subject-matter covered by the bill has been adjusted between the state and federal authorities.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4626) for the widening of Sixteenth street NW. at Piney Branch, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 307) thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6690) providing for the entry of desert lands formerly in the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in Wyoming, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 303) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP submitted a supplemental report (Part 2) to Senate Report No. 302, to accompany the bill (S. 6747) for the relief of the heirs of John Hoffman, deceased, heretofore reported by him from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SCOTT:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) directing that a portion of square No. 857, in the city of Washington, D. C., be reserved for use as an avenue and improved (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to rearrange the customs districts by abolishing such as he deems unnecessary, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment relative to the improvement of Charlotte Harbor, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for removing the water hyacinth from the navigable waters of the State of Florida, etc., to $15,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and order to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment relative to the time required to open any of the drawbridges below the Cambridge Bridge across Charles River or any of the drawbridges across Fort Point channel, Boston, Mass., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for deepening and widening the channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City, Tex., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Galveston, Tex., to $350,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,514,289.70 for the construction of an inland waterway to connect the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for improving the Missouri River on the Missouri side across from Atchison, Kans., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $390,000 for improving Los Angeles Harbor (formerly Wilmington Harbor), California, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PRICES IN CANADA.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a letter from the American consul-general in Ottawa, Canada, inclosing the advance sheets of an inquiry made by the department of labor of Canada into prices in that Dominion. I move that the letter and accompanying papers, together with the charts, be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 409) and referred to the Select Committee on Wages and Prices of Commodities.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF HAWAII—POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. DEPEW. I call up Senate bill 3360.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator from New York calls up Senate bill 3360.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3360) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire at this time to submit some remarks on the postal savings-bank bill.

Mr. DEPEW. I think that this bill can be disposed of in fifteen minutes. It has been read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall speak on that bill if I find it is going to run on, although as the other bill is the special order, I prefer to speak on it.

Mr. DEPEW. I think we can get through with the bill in fifteen minutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not antagonize that; but I want to commence early and get through with my remarks.

Mr. DEPEW. If it will take more than fifteen minutes, I will agree to have it passed over until after the Senator's speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] to add at the end of section 4 a proviso, which will be read.

Mr. DEPEW. I withdraw that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Since the Senator from New York withdraws that amendment, I offer an amendment. In section 4, page 4, line 6, I move to strike out all of the section that follows the word "States," being the proviso.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso at the end of section 4 in the following words:

Provided, That, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, the legislature of the Territory may provide for loans of public moneys, or guaranties of private loans, on proper security to settlers on the public lands for necessary permanent improvements of their homesteads, and for loans, subsidies, or guaranties to persons or corporations for the improvement and increase of transportation facilities.

Mr. DEPEW. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. In section 5, on page 6, line 6, after the word "governor," I move to insert "before patent has been issued."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. On page 2, line 12, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out "one thousand" and insert "six hundred." That reduces to $600 the pay of members of the legislature for each regular session.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. On page 7, line 21, after the word "board," I move to strike out the word "appointed" and to insert "to be appointed by the governor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will propose certain amendments as to the salaries of the officers. The Senator and I have agreed to make the salary of the governor $7,000 instead of $10,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. In section 8, page 10, line 17, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "ten" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "seven," so as to read:

The governor, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. On page 10, line 18, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "five" and insert "four," so as to read:

The secretary of the Territory, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. On page 10, line 19, after the word "thousand," I move to strike out "five hundred," so as to read:

The chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. On page 10, line 20, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "six" and insert "five;" and in line 21, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred," so as to read:

The associate justices of the supreme court, $5,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. In line 22, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "four" and insert "three," and after the word "thousand" to insert "five hundred," so as to read:

The judges of the circuit courts, $3,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. In line 23 I move to strike out "five" before "thousand" and insert "four," so as to read:

The United States district attorney, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEPEW. In line 24, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "four" and insert "three," so as to read:

The United States marshal, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the salary of the district attorney and the marshal under the present law?

Mr. DEPEW. The salary of the district attorney under the present law is $3,000 and of the marshal $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 10, line 25, before the word "dollars," I move to strike out the words "one thousand" and insert "five hundred," so as to read:

And the governor shall receive annually in addition to his salary the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals.

In view of the increase in the governor's salary from $5,000 to $7,000 it strikes me that the increase proposed in the bill ought not to be allowed for stationery and other purposes. I should think that $500 would be sufficient to cover it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, fully realizing the importance of the measure under consideration, fully realizing as well the importance of the legislation that has been at times before the Senate and which will be the special order from this on, I desire to make some suggestions upon Senate bill 5876, the postal savings bill.

At the beginning of the consideration of this subject, Mr. President, I submitted some remarks in the nature of criticism of the bill as it was originally presented to the Senate. Many changes have been made since that time, and we see much comment in the newspapers as to what has been agreed upon between certain men in and out of Congress. Coupled with all of those statements is generally a reminder of what is called the "pledge" of the Republican party in its national platform at the last campaign. It has not as yet been my intention to support the postal savings-bank bill in any form in which it has been presented in this body, but it does not follow at all that I am not willing at any time to support a satisfactory postal savings-bank bill, one that shall be free from legal objections as well as administrative difficulties.

Mr. President, that fearful threat which is held up before us on every occasion, that admonition of loyalty and fidelity to the platform of the Republican party, is contained in these words and none others:

We favor the establishment of a postal savings-bank system for the convenience of the people and the encouragement of thrift.

We favor the establishment of a "system," not that we favor the provisions of any measure then in form.

Mr. President, I shall cheerfully vote for a measure that, according to my judgment and conscience, will accomplish the things stated in that plank in the platform. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] a few days ago pointed out some legal objections to the measure under consideration. I think that the position taken by the Senator is fully justified under the law, and I propose to begin the consideration of this question by getting away from that objection. I would do it by taking off of the bill, which I shall properly denominate the "Carter bill," the head, the label, which reads as follows:

A bill to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

That does not come within the provision or scope of any expression of legislative power in the Constitution of the United States. But there is a provision in the Constitution of the United States that affords an easy release from the embarrassment presented by that title. Section 8, Article I, of the Constitution expressly gives to Congress the power to borrow money, and it places no restriction upon it; it imposes no conditions under which the power may be exercised.

If this measure is to be constitutional, then it must come under that provision. It can not come under the provision of the Constitution relative to the coinage of money, because we are not proposing to coin money. In order to avoid this difficulty, I have written the title to this bill in these words:

A bill authorizing the United States to borrow money through a system of postal savings banks, to provide the manner thereof, and to provide for the receipt, use, disposition, and repayment thereof.

That is strictly the expression of a borrowing clause, and no possible objection could be raised to it under the Constitution.

First, I provide in section 1, or I suggest in section 1, as follows:

That the Treasurer of the United States shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, to borrow on the credit of the United States, through the agencies of the post-offices of the United States, as hereinafter provided, such sums of money as may be deposited at such post-offices in conformity with the provisions of this act, and to agree on behalf of the United States to repay the sums of money so borrowed, with interest thereof at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, at such time and in such manner as hereinafter provided.

That is another strictly borrowing provision. I shall use this draft of a bill as a text in order that I may proceed regularly and orderly along the lines that we must follow in legislating upon this subject. I propose as section 2:

That neither the United States nor any of its agencies, officers, or employees shall be subject to garnishment, attachment, execution, or process of any court in relation to the moneys or depositories thereof under the provisions of this act.

That corresponds to a provision in the Carter bill. Then I propose section 3:

The money deposited by any person under the provisions of this act shall not be subject to the control of any person other than the depositor or his or her legal representative.

The bill before the Senate does not provide for recognition of legal representatives, and inasmuch as it does provide that people not sui generis may deposit money, it leaves that control which must be exercised through some person other than a child unprovided for—nor shall such money, or any evidence of the deposit thereof, be subject to taxation for any purpose or to execution, garnishment, attachment, or legal process of any kind out of any court except for the purpose of making effective the laws of succession or inheritance.

That is another necessary provision which is omitted from the present bill.

Then section 4, as suggested, provides:

Certificates of deposit of money at any post-office or postal savings bank under the provisions of this act shall not be assignable nor shall any title thereto pass by any attempt to assign the same; and such certificates of deposit shall be payable only to the depositor or his or her legal representatives.

That provision is absolutely necessary, because we provide hereafter that when this money passes into the postal savings and canceled, and in lieu of it postal-bank circulation shall to the Treasury of the United States, there to be macerated and canceled, and in lieu of it postal-bank circulation shall issue. So to avoid double circulation we provide against the transfer of the certificates that are handed out at the postal savings bank.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask, in order that I may get the view of the Senator, that he will recur for a moment to the earlier part of what he has said in his address as to the purpose of the bill, that it will be for the borrowing of money. The Senator doubtless has investigated fully the question as to what amount will probably be received by the Government under that system.

In view of that amount of money being brought into the Treasury and being annually added to, I presume, I desire to ask the Senator if he has further considered to what extent the other sources of revenue of the Government should be reduced, or, rather, how far those sources will be affected and the revenue reduced by the proposed system? If the Senator is going to reach that hereafter I will not ask him to answer it now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would just as lief answer it now, and anticipate it. The provisions of the amendment I am speaking of do not provide for adding a dollar to the circulation. The money that comes in from the postal savings banks is substituted by the new issue of an equivalent amount, and it is sent back to the particular central savings bank from which the money came. The Senator from Georgia will see in a moment——

Mr. BACON. For deposit?

Mr. HEYBURN. That I propose the establishment of a postal savings bank at the capital of each State and that all the post-offices in that State shall do business through that savings bank. I say at the capital, because that would avoid the eternal squabble that would go on as to where it should be located in case we did not locate it at the capital. I think that answers the Senator's question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I am asking not for argument, but for information——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am very glad to be interrupted by the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I merely desired to know if the idea of the Senator was that thereafter the money should be on deposit in that bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. I provide what the bank shall do with it. In a very brief time the Senator will see.

Then section 5 provides for the replacement of lost certificates. I need not go into that. It provides that adequate proof shall be made of the loss and the identity, and that thereupon a certificate shall issue in lieu of the lost certificate. In view of the class of at least a large part of the depositors in such institutions it is necessary to have such a provision. The Government ought not to lay the foundation for profit through the misfortunes of those people.

Now, I come to the section dealing with the post-offices:

SEC. 6. That all post-offices in the United States or the Territories, districts or insular possessions thereof now or hereafter authorized to sell money orders are hereby authorized to receive from any persons over the age of —— years, money in sums of not less than $1 or multiples thereof nor more than $100 during any calendar month, or in an aggregate sum which shall not at any time exceed $500.

I am very much inclined to eliminate the words "or insular possessions." I think we had better perhaps try this system on at home, where we can have close supervision of it than to send it out in the beginning into those more or less helpless and new countries.

It will be observed that this makes the post-offices only the agency of the postal savings banks, and not in themselves postal savings banks. I go back a little—

Or in an aggregate sum which shall not at any time exceed $500, and to issue to such depositor a numbered certificate showing the amount deposited, which certificate shall state on its face that the sum of money therein named is deposited under the provisions of this act and subject to the terms and conditions thereof; that said sum so deposited is payable to the depositor or his legal representative, with interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum.

Another section is that—

Interest shall be paid upon such deposits at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, to be computed upon periods commencing at the beginning of the first calendar month after such deposit and ending at the beginning of the last calendar month before the withdrawal of such deposit.

That provides for the paying of the money into the post-office. It is not an elaborate or a cumbersome provision; it is a short section, but, I think, completely covers all the necessities of the case and does not leave it to rules and regulations to be established in the future.

Now, section 7 is:

Whenever the postmaster shall have on hand deposits amounting to $100 or more, he or she shall transmit the same to the postal savings bank herein provided to be established in the State wherein such post-office is situated, and shall accompany such deposit with a statement of the date of each deposit, the name of the depositor, the amount deposited, and the number of the certificate issued by such postmaster; and such postmaster shall retain in the post-office a copy of such statement.

That is all there is. It provides the method of transmitting money that is paid into the post-office to the postal savings bank.

Upon the receipt of such deposit and statement the proper officer of the postal savings bank shall properly enter in the records of such bank the facts stated in such statement, and note in said entry the date from which such deposit shall draw interest—

That is so as to avoid computing interest every time they have occasion to respond to a withdrawal—

And said postal savings bank shall thereupon make and send to the postmaster from whom such deposit was received a numbered original and duplicate certificate of the receipt of the deposit, stating the date received, the amount, the name of the depositor, and the date from which interest is to be paid. Upon the receipt of such certificate the postmaster shall, upon demand of the depositor or his or her legal representative, deliver to such depositor or to such legal representative the original certificate upon the surrender by the depositor or his or her legal representative of the certificate given by the postmaster at the time of such deposit in the post-office—

So that when the certificate of the postal savings bank reaches the depositor he must surrender the preliminary certificate which the postmaster gave him—

And thereupon the postmaster shall cancel and keep on file such canceled certificate and make and keep a record of such transaction in a book to be kept for that purpose. Thereupon the loan—

Bear this in mind—

Thereupon the loan of the money so deposited shall be complete, and the relation of debtor and creditor be fully established between such depositor and the United States of America pursuant to the terms of this act, and the numbered original certificate in this section provided to be issued by the postal savings bank shall be the evidence of such relation.

Mr. President, that completes the transaction—the transfer of the money from the depositor to the Government of the United States. It is complete when the certificate of deposit made by the postal savings bank is delivered to the depositor. Thereafter the relation of debtor and creditor exists. From that time on it is a question of paying the interest and the principal. It places it entirely upon the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to borrow money without limit.

The next section provides for withdrawing the money by these depositors or, in other words, provides for the repayment by the Government to the party making the loan:

Any person desiring to withdraw money deposited with the postmaster, as aforesaid under the provisions of this act, shall notify the postmaster in writing upon blank forms to be provided by the postmaster for that purpose—

This is in response to the absence of any provision in the bill under consideration regulating the manner of withdrawing. This states a brief and sufficient method—

In writing upon blank forms to be provided by the postmaster for that purpose, which notice shall show the date when said notice is given, the amount to be withdrawn, the date and number of the deposit against which such withdrawal is made, and shall be signed by the depositor or his assignee and delivered to the postmaster.

That is the place where I neglected making the change of the word "assignee." I adopted a uniform expression here—"legal representative."

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. May I ask a question of the Senator for information?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. Who is to pay the expense of this—the Government?

Mr. HEYBURN. That will be provided for.

Mr. BRADLEY. That is further along?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I call attention to that so that the Senator's mind may be prepared for it. The bill provides that the notes that shall be issued in lieu of the money deposited shall not be money until they reach the postal savings bank, because, like national-bank notes, they are signed by the officers of the bank, who are the direct medium of issue, so that they do not come under the expensive rate of express for the transmission of currency. But that will develop at the proper time. The notes not being completed or signed will save a very large sum of money as against the proposition of transmitting money that is in itself complete. I had that in mind when I was preparing this draft:

The postmaster shall enter such demand upon a proper book kept for that purpose, and thereupon forward such demand to the postal savings bank in the State where such post-office is located.

The postmaster here is merely the medium through whom the postal savings bank receives and pays the money, so that the depositor need never go away from or beyond his local post-office. The responsible custodianship of the money does not rest in the local post-offices, but rests in the postal savings bank in the capital of each State:

The postmaster shall enter such demand upon a proper book kept for that purpose, and thereupon forward such demand to the postal savings bank in the State where such post-office is located. Upon the receipt of the same the postal savings bank shall investigate and check the account of said depositor; and if it is found upon such investigation that the amount sought to be withdrawn by the depositor is to his or her credit, it shall be the duty of the said postal savings bank, after recording such notice and the facts ascertained in a book to be kept for that purpose, to issue the cashier's check upon such bank for the amount to be withdrawn, payable to the order of the depositor, and shall forward the same to the post-office where the notice of withdrawal was filed.

There is another element of safety—the cashier's check. The check of the cashier of the postal savings bank, and that bank authorized by statute, as in this case, would be entirely satisfactory to every depositor, because it is hereinafter provided that no national bank shall make any charge for cashing such checks. We have that right of control so far as the national banks are concerned. The fact is, that no one would pretend to discount or shave a check of that kind, and the element of safety is observed all the way through.

Then it is forwarded to the postmaster—"and the postmaster at said office shall deliver the same to said depositor upon the surrender" by the depositor "of the certificate" given by the postmaster at the time of the deposit. So there are no two papers out at the same time for the same purpose. When the withdrawal is not for the full amount, "then the amount of such withdrawal shall be indorsed upon such certificate, and the certificate returned to the depositor."

That is all that there is on that page and a half, but in my judgment it is necessary——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I am detained from the Senate nearly all the time in committee, and I will ask the Senator from Idaho whether what he is reading is a proposed substitute for the committee bill in relation to postal savings banks?

Mr. HEYBURN. It would amount to that; yes. It covers all of the provisions in the existing bill.

I will say now, in all candor, that I am using this proposed substitute as a text in order that I may compare it as I go along, and I am not going to extend my remarks very long on this question, but I shall probably not offer this as a substitute, or I may. I will be governed by what disposition the Senate makes of this measure or seems to be about to make of it to-morrow, or before the end of the legislative day to-morrow. I have heard frequent expressions of opinion—and I feel at perfect liberty, inasmuch as I speak generally, to state the fact—among Members of this body in favor of referring this measure back to the committee. I have found very few Members of this body who are satisfied with the legislation as it stands at this time. They all feel that the subject is too great, that the action is too irrevocable, to take chances upon anything less than the very best that we can devise after long consideration. There is no promise to urge us to perfect this bill during the first part of the first session of this Congress, and the duty of careful consideration is so much beyond and above that of hasty compliance, as that no man should hesitate, if his mind is in doubt, to postpone the ultimate action, fraught with such grave consequences, until we can give the measure the attention it should have. We must, for our own credit and for the law, avoid enacting unconstitutional measures in this body. I think it may be said in every instance where our action has been held to be unsupported by the Constitution, that it was the result of hasty action. We have seen measures come in here with the alleged pressure of an administration behind them and forced through, only to be told a little later that we have failed in giving such consideration as to insure correct action.

Now, Mr. President, I have enumerated in this draft of a bill the powers of the postal savings banks, into whose hands this sum of money, whatever it may be, great or small, passes. It is obvious that we can not, without serious inconveniences and difficulties, send into circulation again the same money that is received at the post-offices. It is desirable, so far as we may, to have uniformity in our circulating medium. This would be a postal savings-bank note on its face. It would originate with the Treasury of the United States, as national-bank notes do. It would be provided to the postal savings banks, as national-bank notes are now provided to the national banks. The postal savings banks would not give security, because they have delivered value, and that is one of the very best features of this proposition. The Government has retired dollar for dollar against the issue, so that there is no possible question of security behind the issue, and it is made legal tender beyond the extent of the national-bank notes, because a national-bank note is not legal tender, but we make it legal tender for the payment of all debts except customs dues, and we must preserve the limitation there, because that is where our gold comes back from abroad. That reduces this question down to the borrowing of this money directly by the Government from the citizen.

The draft of the bill provides that any of the postal savings banks may loan this money, or any part of it, to other banking institutions, national and state; to loan it upon the same conditions that the Government to-day deposits public money or loans it to the banks, upon giving the same class, character, and sufficiency of security that the Government requires to-day, and that it shall be loaned to these banks at not less than 3 per cent. Then, in response to what I consider the almost universal demand that this money be stayed with chains and anchors against floating into the corner of the tilted table of finance, it is provided that no bank receiving this money from the postal savings banks shall loan it for a longer period than ninety days. Just bear that in mind. That ninety days means that this money is to come home and register itself every ninety days, and it can not float over permanently into speculative centers, and that time limit is the solution of that question. So that ample security is provided against loss, because, under the present system, the Government loans money or deposits it against a class of securities that have never resulted in any loss to the Government.

The measure would provide that the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should appoint the director of each of these postal savings banks. I have confidence enough in the administrative and legislative branches of this Government to believe that there would always be a sense of responsibility that would make it impossible to make these banks political playthings. I would appoint the directors for a term of five years or, at the suggestion of the legislative body, a longer term. I would not have them all go in or all go out of office at the same time, but overlap their terms, so that there would always be the basis of responsibility and experience and capacity in the management of the affairs of the banks.

I would make these postal savings banks national depositories. I would make them the agency through which to engage for the loan or purchase of gold and silver. I would make them the handmaidens of the Government, because they will always be close to the scene of responsible action, there being one at the capital of each State.

It may be suggested that that is rather an expensive proposition, but it is not as expensive as the proposition now before the Senate. It localizes the business of the postal savings institutions, and it provides for a new and clean substitute for the money, real or imaginary, which is resting in old stockings or tin cans.

Did I believe that the minds of the Senate were open enough to receive a measure along these lines I would not hesitate to offer these suggestions in the form of a substitute; but I am inclined to believe that there is a spirit abroad in the Senate to the effect that they will just accept the pending bill because it is a good bit of trouble to make any other—and I say that with all due regard for my associates. I have been told more than once by members of the Senate that the bill was far from being satisfactory, and that accompanied by the inquiry, "But what can we do?" We can stay here long enough and work industriously enough to frame a law that will meet that which is more important than the carelessly written pledge in a platform or the expediency of the hour—a measure that will meet the demands and the necessities of the American people.

The idea of sacrificing the interests of the people merely to conform to a pledge in a platform that was made after many of us had assumed the responsibilities belonging to our office! The conscience of the members of this body was not created at Chicago; their responsibility existed before the convention, and it was not changed by the convention. A measure along the lines I have suggested is as much a compliance with the pledge or declaration in the platform as any other measure that results in the enactment of a postal savings-bank bill.

If we enact it, let it be in conformity with the law and the Constitution, and let there be no doubt about it. Let us not be staggering around in the darkness and fog of wonderment for a year or two as to the ultimate fate of our bill when it is subjected to the test in the courts.

Mr. President, while I have not dealt with all the details that are necessary and incident to the enactment of such a measure, I have certainly covered the controlling ideas, and I state candidly that I have on my desk the complete proposition that would result in the establishment of a system of postal savings banks that would leave no open questions, and, in my judgment, would meet with every political requirement and with every responsible obligation that rests upon the members of this body.

Mr. BRADLEY rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. BRADLEY. I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me for a moment for a very brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRADLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the ill-considered substitute offered by the Senator from Idaho makes it manifest that he was endeavoring to get something different, rather than something better. The Senator seriously argued to the Senate that the constitutionality of a bill could be determined by the character of its title.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not, Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. No comment need be made on that.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I do not want it to go out to the country under any such garbled statement of what I said as that. The Senator will pardon me for using that term, but there can not be any foundation for that statement at all.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho laboriously proceeded to show how his title would make the bill constitutional, whereas the title under which it now rests would tend to make it unconstitutional. Let the Senator's remarks stand for themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I neither attempted to show it nor did I laboriously try to show it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. He does? I should think he would, after a statement like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana leaves the RECORD to speak for itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will leave it.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Idaho may well leave the room, for he can not defend the kind of speech he made here. [Laughter.]

For thirty-seven years, Mr. President, this subject has been before the Congress of the United States. The bill now pending constitutes the combined wisdom of all the men who have studied this question from the day of its presentation by Postmaster-General Creswell up to this hour. Approved by the Post-Office Department, presented in substantial form by our former colleague, Mr. Knox, who gave the subject profound consideration, and a long line of Senators and Representatives who have introduced bills upon this subject; in the pending bill we have followed the lines they laid down; yet the Senator from Idaho, with an imagination truly wonderful to contemplate, sits down in his room and in one night presents a measure here, which he thinks would be an improvement, in the way of a substitute that has no other virtue on earth than to be different from the pending measure. I pretend to say, Mr. President, that if the proposed substitute of the Senator from Idaho should be enacted into law, it would be ridiculous in operation and would break down the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana takes his seat I desire to ask him a question, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I wish to ask a question for information for my guidance. The Senator from Montana refers to the bill now pending as being one which is perfect in its provisions and satisfactory. The question I desire to ask the Senator is based upon——

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana did not say the bill was perfect.

Mr. BACON. Well, acceptable.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana realizes that all human productions are imperfect.

Mr. BACON. What I am coming to is this—I am asking the question for information: We have outgivings from the press and otherwise that some very radical amendments are to be offered to this bill in the closing hours of the discussion.

Mr. CARTER. I think the word "radical" might be stricken out of the statement.

Mr. BACON. I will say "material," then. When I say "radical," I mean it goes to the root. That is what "radical" means, and if some of the amendments which are suggested as being those contemplated are as now suggested in the press, they are radical. But I will not quibble on words. I will say "material." I will say to the Senator that I am asking the question in order that I may give the proper investigation and examination to the bill upon which we may be called upon to vote. In view of the fact that we have agreed upon a day to vote, I think we ought to be put in possession, as early as practicable, of any material amendments which it is intended to submit for the action of the Senate. It is with that view that I asked the question whether the bill upon which we shall be called upon to vote is substantially the bill now before the Senate, or whether there are material, if not radical, amendments to be offered?

Mr. CARTER. The inquiry of the Senator from Georgia is very proper, and I think that any amendment of a material character which is to be proposed might well be presented to-day and printed, so as to be subject to inspection.

Mr. BACON. I think so.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the Senator from Utah contemplates presenting an amendment, and will probably present it during the day. I have, however, no definite information on that subject.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRADLEY. For fear that I will forget that I have any time at all, I think I will decline to yield any further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BRADLEY. The Senator from New York desires that a vote shall be taken on the bill in his charge, which he thinks has precedence of any remarks I may make. If that is true, of course I do not desire to proceed until that vote shall have been taken.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from New York. What do I understand has become of the proviso with reference to guaranteeing——

Mr. DEPEW. It has been stricken out.

Mr. President, the Hawaiian bill was on the eve of passage when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] began his speech, and I should like now to have a vote on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 25, before the word "dollars," strike out "one thousand" and insert "five hundred," so that if amended it will read:

> And the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. Has unanimous consent been given to vote on this bill to-day?

Mr. DEPEW. The bill is before the Senate properly by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. It is open for debate?

Mr. DEPEW. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has stricken from the bill a provision allowing the territorial government of the Hawaiian Islands to obligate itself——

Mr. DEPEW. To loan its money or credit to a corporation or an individual. That is stricken out.

Mr. CLAY. That is stricken out?

Mr. DEPEW. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Let me call the Senator's attention to the first section of the bill, which repeals the general laws of the United States applying to territorial governments.

Mr. DEPEW. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain all that to him.

Mr. CLAY. Just one minute, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. My understanding is that it repeals probably thirty or forty sections of the Revised Statutes, and I thought that one of those was a provision that territorial governments should not create indebtedness beyond a certain amount or become obligated to pay the indebtedness of corporations or individuals except by consent of Congress.

I think the Senator will find on an examination of the Revised Statutes that this first section repeals a provision which was intended generally to apply to territorial governments, limiting the territorial legislatures as to what amount of indebtedness should be created in the Territories.

Mr. DEPEW. That is limited in the Hawaiian organic act.

Mr. CLAY. That may be true. If there is a limitation in the act itself, then the general law would not apply.

Mr. DEPEW. The reason for taking this out is that there is a general law applying to all Territories. That is the one covered by this section.

Mr. CLAY. And the Senator says there is a limitation in the original act creating the territorial government of Hawaii?

Mr. DEPEW. There is; and also in this amendment.

Mr. CLAY. That would probably make the situation different.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech and suggestions of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. It would seem, however, that his suggestion would lead to the entire destruction of the bill as now offered, and consequently I should be opposed to so radical a step. That there may be certain provisions in it which should be amended may be quite true, but I can not quite consent that the bill should be destroyed by the adoption of a substitute.

I am aware that the banks are generally opposed to postal savings depositories, and I think that opposition grows out of misapprehension, to a large extent, upon their part. I do not condemn the banks because they are jealous of their rights and desire to protect fully the interests of their depositors. That is praiseworthy, but there is nothing in this bill which is calculated in any way to injure the banks in any respect.

All persons who are willing to risk their deposits in banks where they can obtain 3 or 4 per cent on time deposits will continue their deposits. Hence none of the money they now have will be withdrawn or turned into postal depositories.

Those who will place their money in the postal depositories consist of two classes of people—one who are naturally afraid to risk the bank, and the other, who, when the slightest danger is manifested, withdraw their deposits and unnecessarily alarm other depositors. They are known as "scare depositors," and are really a disadvantage to any bank. The first class is composed in the main of foreigners who have comparatively recently arrived in this country, who know nothing of our banking institutions, and who therefore regard the banks with suspicion and distrust. To these may be added those persons who, though born in our midst, are uneducated and ignorant of commercial affairs. These people, however, are willing to risk the Government and will place their money in postal savings depositories when otherwise they would store it in old stockings, strong boxes, or other places. The second class is equally willing to risk the Government and would not attempt to withdraw their money whenever they hear the breaking of a financial twig.

The money derived from these two classes would be placed in the depositories, when otherwise it would not be placed in any bank, or if so placed, constitute a constant menace to the banking business.

Again, the banks, instead of paying 4 per cent for time deposits, would only pay 2½ per cent. Hence, I repeat that the banks, instead of being injured, would be directly benefited, and the Nation would be benefited by bringing into circulation a large amount of money which otherwise would be hidden away.

There are many who are unwilling to risk the banks. There are none who are unwilling to risk the Government. The guaranty of the banks amounts to nothing compared to the guaranty of the Government.

But we have been asked why it is that only 2 per cent should be paid to the depositor and 2¼ per cent should be required by the Government from the banks. This is merely a captious criticism. If it were not for the charge of this additional one-quarter per cent by the Government we would be confronted with the objection that the whole scheme is unconstitutional, because the Government, at great expense, would be compelled to provide the necessary facilities for depositories merely to protect the people by guaranty of their deposits. The bank can well afford to pay 2¼ per cent, and the Government, by requiring of the banks the one-quarter per cent additional for the purpose of necessary equipment and expenses, could administer the law and thus benefit the people, without incurring expense which would necessitate a tax upon the people.

We have been ridiculed, too, upon the ground that no condition can be lawfully attached to these deposits. For instance, the condition that the deposits of a married woman shall not be responsible for the debts of her husband is said to be ridiculous, and a condition that the State alone can attach. If the States will not, as you have been told, in some instances protect a married woman from robbery by her husband, surely the Nation should, for a man who can not support his family without robbing his wife of her hard earnings should starve on general principles. [Laughter.]

But it must be remembered that this is not a state institution. This is a national institution, created under the authority of the Constitution of the United States, and being under its authority, Congress has the right to attach any conditions that it sees fit to these deposits, and it is not in the power of the States to object.

But we are told that it is not provided in the bill that the States may not tax these deposits. It is not necessary to make such a provision. The Government borrows this money. The certificates or receipts of deposits issued by the Government show on their faces that the Government has borrowed the money, and this is sufficient to prevent taxation by a State. The certificates could not be the subject of taxation, because such taxation would cripple the exercise of a governmental power. Such was the decision of the Supreme Court in Weston v. The City Council of Charleston (2 Pet., 449). In that case the court held that Congress had the right to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and that stock issued for the same is the evidence of a debt created in the exercise of the borrowing power, and hence that the stock of the United States bank in the hands of the holder was not subject to taxation. This is in principle a reiteration of the opinion of the Supreme Court in McCulloch v. Maryland.

In that opinion, which is one of the leading opinions, one of the greatest opinions, that was ever delivered by the Supreme Court of the United States, the court, through Chief Justice Marshall, disposes of the dangerous doctrine which had been theretofore, and by some even since, contended for, that under the Constitution of the United States all power was delegated to the General Government by the States, who alone were truly sovereign, and must be exercised in subordination to the States, which alone possessed supreme dominion. Substantially, the Chief Justice held in that opinion that such power was not conferred by the States; that the conventions were called by the people, and that, while the Constitution was framed by the convention, it had no vitality until it was submitted to the people of the States and ratified by them; that it did not become the Constitution by reason of the action of delegates, but became the Constitution by reason of the approval of the whole people. And in the preamble of that Constitution we find it is distinctly stated that "We, the people, ordain." What people? "We, the people of the United States," ordain this Constitution; not we, the people of the States—not the States—but "We, the people of the United States."

In this opinion the constitutionality of the law creating the United States bank was upheld, notwithstanding it is admitted by the court that among the enumerated powers nothing can be found authorizing its establishment or the creation of a corporation. But these powers were held to be implied and necessary for the carrying into effect of the powers granted.

Neither can the position be successfully maintained that the bill creates a distinction between a citizen who deposits in bank and one who deposits in the post-office. The citizen who deposits his money in bank may draw any per cent he may be able to obtain, and his contract with the bank is entirely different from a contract made with the Government, where the citizen can obtain no more than 2 per cent. The attitude of the Government to one from whom it borrows money is entirely different from its attitude toward one from whom it does not borrow money and with whom it has no business relation or connection.

Nor can I subscribe to the doctrine asserted that "a government which protects the weak thereby weakens the strong." The strong are able to protect themselves, the weak are not, and while all just laws are intended to protect all citizens, they are much more necessary for the protection of the weak, who but for such protection would be destroyed.

The object of the law is not to borrow from the people to loan to the banks, as contended, but to borrow from the people under a guaranty for their protection, encouragement, and upbuilding, and loan to the banks to cover the expense of the Government in aiding the people. Nor is it probable as contended that money will be taken from the banks and loaned to the Government and the same money replaced by the post-offices, in the same banks, because, as stated, in nearly every instance the money loaned would not be taken from and would never go into the banks except under the guaranty of the present bill. The Government does not loan money to the banks in order to derive pecuniary benefit therefrom, but it loans it in order to benefit the people—the poor, uneducated, and timid, who otherwise would never obtain any increase on their carefully hoarded money. By reason of these deposits the circulation would be greatly increased and thus the entire country be benefited, the Government being enabled, if necessary, to give relief in times of war or panic and simultaneously protect the people from loss.

Now, as to the constitutionality of the bill. The principle therein contained has been indorsed by the Republican party in national convention, and it has been indorsed by the President, himself a learned and distinguished constitutional lawyer and jurist. I have unlimited confidence in the ability and patriotism of the party, and in the ability and patriotism of the President as well, and am willing to be guided by them. Besides, the people, the great controlling power, the real sovereigns, demand the passage of this measure, and if I had a doubt it would always be resolved in favor of the people.

But is the bill constitutional? We are told it can not be justified under the power granted to Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads, nor under the commerce clause, nor under the power to coin money, nor under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, nor under the general-welfare clause.

Said the Supreme Court in Legal-tender cases (12 Wall., 457–534):

> It is not indispensably necessary to the existence of any power claimed for the Federal Government that it can be found in the words of the Constitution, or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred.
> So that even if the power be not fully granted in any one of these particulars, it is sufficient if it may be inferred by grouping any number of them together.

I assert, in the first place, that the power to regulate commerce among the States clearly implies the right to do any act that will advance, enlarge, or benefit commerce among them. There is probably nothing better calculated to accomplish these ends than to provide for the circulation of a sufficient supply of good money. The more money we have in circulation among the States the easier commercial transactions are carried on. The greater the circulation the greater the incentive to embark in enterprise and the easier to finance it. Certainly, it may be said, at least, that the bill under consideration is calculated to increase commercial activity and prosperity.

Again, under the general-welfare clause, the Supreme Court has not confined itself to the literal interpretation of that clause, but has said:

> Any act of Congress which plainly and directly tends to enhance the respect and love of the citizen for the institutions of his country and to quicken and strengthen his motives to defend them, and which is germane to and intimately connected with and appropriate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted by Congress, must be valid. (160 U. S., 668.)

In that case the court was considering the constitutional right of the Government to condemn land for the purpose of erecting marked tablets showing the positions of the various divisions of the army and otherwise designating the ground on which was fought the great battle of Gettysburg. No man can find specific language in any one of the powers delegated to Congress authorizing such action. The court nevertheless held that the act was constitutional and the power of condemnation could be properly exercised.

In that opinion the court says:

> Such a use seems not only a public use, but one so closely connected with the welfare of the Republic itself as to be within the powers granted Congress by the Constitution for the purpose of protecting and preserving the whole country. It would be a great object lesson to all who looked upon the land thus cared for, and it would show a proper recognition of the great things that were done on those momentous days.

I challenge any Senator to point out in any one of the powers granted to Congress the power to condemn land for the purposes named. In that case the court proceeded upon the principle that the condemnation was for a public use. The establishment of a postal savings depository is also for a public use. That enactment was held to be closely connected with the welfare of the Republic, and so, too, is this. And while on the general welfare of the Republic, it is proper to say that the Constitution itself declares in its opening clause that it is ordained, among other things, to "promote the general welfare." The general welfare there intended was not alone the providing for the collection of taxes to pay debts. Indeed, we may assume that the chief purpose of the Constitution was to provide for the general welfare. This would seem to include almost every other purpose. The general welfare necessitates the "formation of a more perfect union, the establishment of justice, the insuring of general tranquillity, the providing for the common defense, and the securing of the blessings of liberty," for each one of these is only a constituent part of the general welfare. Securing the general welfare was the cardinal purpose of the Constitution, and anything that more fully carries that purpose into effect, although not embraced specifically in the other purposes declared, is within the spirit of that instrument. Hence the court very properly said, in the Gettysburg case:

No narrow view of the character of this proposed use should be taken. Its national character and import, we think, are plain. The power to condemn for this purpose need not be plainly and unmistakably deduced from any one of the particularly specified powers. Any number of those powers may be grouped together and inferences from them all may be drawn that the power claimed has been conferred.

Passing to the construction of the power conferred "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." What was the purpose, what is the meaning, and what is the scope of this authority? We are told that it was intended that this power should be exercised alone in case of war, insurrection, famine, or some such calamity or the happening of some extraordinary thing which rendered the borrowing of money an absolute necessity. Even if such had been the intention, yet, not having been expressed, Congress may act under that grant whenever in its wisdom such action is necessary.

Said the Supreme Court in Legal-tender case (110 U. S.):

The words "to borrow money," as used in the Constitution to designate a power vested in the National Government for the safety and welfare of the whole people, are not to receive that limited and restricted interpretation and meaning which they would have in a penal statute, or in an authority conferred by law or by contract upon trustees or agents for private persons.

It can not be controverted that when the fourteenth amendment was originally considered one of the principal, if not the principal, object was to confer citizenship upon a class of people who had hitherto been slaves, and not only to confer citizenship upon them, but to protect them in the exercise of that citizenship. They had been freed, but freedom unaccompanied by a protected citizenship was a bauble and a sham. Hence the amendment was adopted declaring them "citizens of the United States and the States of their residence." And in order that they might not be discriminated against by the States, it was declared:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any citizen of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The makers of this article "builded wiser than they knew," for it has proven a very bulwark of freedom not only to former slaves, but to every citizen, natural and artificial, throughout the Union. It has been appealed to more frequently and has been the subject of more judicial investigation than any other article in the Constitution. Yet it was never contended that because of its original purpose it could not be legislated under by Congress or utilized for the benefit of all who come within the purview of its provisions.

So we may say of the power to borrow money, whatever may have been intended to be specifically accomplished under it, Congress has power under that grant to legislate for any purpose coming within its purview.

I shall not consume time by inquiring what was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, except to say that if such events as those enumerated alone were intended to authorize the borrowing of money, the power granted would have been limited to those purposes. The power granted has no limitation placed upon it. It is general, and it is for Congress to say what legislation is authorized by it. The court has authority only in such a case to determine whether the means devised in the execution of that power are forbidden by the Constitution. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 457.)

Now, is the acceptance of the money of the people by the Government and the issuance of certificates agreeing to repay it borrowing money? If not, what is it? By the issuance of certificates the Government becomes invested with the money of the citizen, which it does not propose to retain permanently, but which it agrees to repay. By such action the relation of debtor and creditor is established. As to what the Government may do with that money is its business and not the concern of others, provided it is not squandered or invested in an unlawful enterprise. The Government having the authority to borrow, the courts can not abridge that right, but can only determine whether the means provided for the borrowing are forbidden by the Constitution. They can not determine that such means are not granted, but whether they are actually forbidden.

Courts can not inquire into the necessity for such laws; that is entirely a matter with Congress.

Said the Supreme Court in Legal-tender cases (12 Wall., 542):

The degree of the necessity for any Congressional enactment or the relative degree of its appropriateness is for consideration in Congress, not here.

The court then quotes from Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland:

When the law is not prohibitive and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground.

And in the same case the court said that it had no power to hold that the means selected were beyond the power of Congress, because it might be of opinion that other means to the same end would have been more appropriate.

Now, Mr. President, I do not question the honesty of purpose of those who are members of the Democratic party in their devotion to the Constitution, but I deny that they only are devoted to that instrument. Republicans are certainly as much devoted to that instrument as they are, although it would seem from the loose language sometimes employed by their representatives that they would make the impression that Republicans do not have the proper reverence for that instrument, and have, indeed, frequently invaded its provisions and set it at naught. I deny the right of Democrats to deliver lectures to Republicans on constitutional law. Their action in the past shows them not qualified to advise.

The truth of history demands that I should refer to the record of the Democratic party before, during, and since the great civil war. I do this with no purpose to rekindle animosities or to offend the sensibilities of anyone. No man sooner realized after the war that it had ceased and it was the duty of all good citizens to go actively to work to heal wounds, to preach and practice forgiveness, and that we were, in fact, brothers having a common interest in one great nation. There is not now and never has been any bitterness in my heart. I would willingly forget all the animosities, all the heartburnings, all the sufferings of that terrible period, and cherish in common with those who opposed us all the glories of the great conflict that tore the badge of slavery from the flag but retained every star on its field of blue.

But, Mr. President, it must not be forgotten that those who lecture us now on the Constitution belong to that same school which taught the right of secession. Had they succeeded, we would have had no Union and no Constitution, and our States would have doubtless been in the same condition as the warring states of South America. Our Constitution would have been in the same condition as John Sloan, who went out West and was run over by a freight train. A dispatch was sent to his father, "Your son John run over by freight train to-day and killed." The old man answered, "Send the remains home." Two or three hours after an answer came, "There hain't none to send." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Democratic party fought the constitutionality of the law to give the proceeds of certain sales of public lands to the States for purposes of education, and had they succeeded many of our great institutions of learning would not exist.

They have persistently contended, and yet contend, that the doctrine of protection had, and has, no warrant in the Constitution, and had they succeeded in establishing this doctrine the unparalleled prosperity that has made ours the richest nation of the world would never have blessed the American people.

They fought as unconstitutional the issuance of greenbacks during the war, and had they succeeded in that and their position on the tariff would have destroyed the American Union.

They contested the constitutionality of the legal-tender acts, which were absolutely necessary to the financial and business interests, yea, to the very life of the Nation.

They contended that the national banking law was unconstitutional, and if they had succeeded the Nation would have been deprived of the present banking system, which has proven absolutely essential to its welfare and prosperity.

For years they denied the authority of the Government to inaugurate or maintain a system of internal improvements, and had they succeeded would have turned back the hands on the dial of progress full half a century.

They opposed the adoption of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, but after they were adopted, in 1876, in their national platform, declared themselves devoted to the Constitution of the United States, with its amendments.

To show you how far our critics have gone, I call your attention to the Democratic national platform of 1868, where, in speaking of the Republican party, they made this remarkable declaration:

> Under its repeated assaults the pillars of the Government are rocking on their base, and should it succeed in November next and inaugurate its President, we will meet as a subjugated and conquered people, amid the ruins of liberty and the scattered fragments of the Constitution.

Indeed, the Democratic party has resisted as unconstitutional nearly every great law placed in the statutes since 1861.

Mr. President, the Republican party proudly stands upon its record. I recall none of these great laws denounced as unconstitutional which have not been upheld by the Supreme Court. Under them the country has made rapid strides at home and abroad; it has triumphed on the land and the sea; its pillars, instead of rocking at their base, have grown firmer and more secure; we have no conquered or subjugated people, but from one end of the Union to the other the flag waves over all, is loved by all, and beneath its folds is found no crouching or degraded slave. All are free, all are protected, all are marching along in the great highway of national progress, shoulder to shoulder, a band of brothers to the accomplishment of still greater things. I trust in God that that great procession will continue, triumphal as it is, with its numbers augmented each day until time, having fully accomplished its mission, shall fall asleep in the arms of eternity.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer an amendment to the postal savings-bank bill. I ask that it be printed and go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table, without objection.

Mr. GORE. In this connection I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the governor of Oklahoma, a very luminous statement, in regard to the system of guaranteeing deposits.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUTHRIE, OKLA., February 19, 1910.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your request for information in regard to the Oklahoma depositors' guaranty law, I herewith give you the following information:

The depositors' guaranty fund consists of a reserve fund of 5 per cent of the total average deposits guaranteed.

This fund to be created by the payment the first year of 1 per cent of the total average deposits and the payment of one-fifth of 1 per cent of the total average deposits annually thereafter.

One per cent of the increase of deposits paid annually.

New banks pay into the guaranty fund 5 per cent of their capital, which is adjusted on the basis of their deposits at the end of one year.

In case of bank failures an emergency assessment not to exceed 2 per cent of the average deposits may be collected in any one year, and should the guaranty fund be not sufficient to pay the depositors, certificates of indebtedness bearing 6 per cent interest may be issued, the certificates to be paid from future assessments.

This guaranty fund is only a part of the guaranty that is given to the depositors of state banks in Oklahoma. There are many safeguards that protect the depositor, a few of which are as follows:

"The bank commissioner has authority to remove any reckless, incompetent, or dishonest officer of a bank.

"An officer of a bank can not borrow the funds of his bank.

"Interest on deposits are limited by the bank commissioner.

"The deposits of a bank can not exceed ten times the amount of its capital and surplus.

"All officers having care of the funds of the bank must file bonds with the state banking board.

"Two regular examinations are made by the bank commissioner, and five reports are made to the banking department.

"In case of failure the bank commissioner liquidates the bank without the excessive fees of a receiver."

It will be remembered by you that at the time the depositors' guaranty law of Oklahoma was being discussed, the panic of 1907, which has been called a "currency stringency," was at its height. Our first state government had just been formed and financial matters were in a chaotic condition. Clearing-house certificates were accepted, but under protest, and the feeling of uneasiness and lost confidence was not only in the minds of the depositors, but the bankers were afraid of each other and, with this feeling, could not instill in the minds of the depositors the idea that their money was safe.

It is true that statistics show that only a small per cent of the total deposits of banks in the United States are lost through bank failures, but it is exceedingly hard to convince and quiet a depositor when there is even talk of a bank not being safe; and, indeed, it is a small amount of consolation to a depositor who has his money tied up in a failed bank to read statistics stating that only one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the total deposits in banks are lost each year.

A deposit in a failed bank is the poorest asset on earth. It has no value. You can not pay bills with it; you can not keep a mortgage from being foreclosed; you can not use it with a wholesale house; you can not discount it at any price.

Again, bank failures are barbarous. The depositors, realizing their helpless condition, become frantic, and police are called to quell riots, disperse mobs, and protect the officers of the bank from violence. Suicide results, and yet this is the result of modern business conditions existing under state banking laws in other States and under the national-banking system.

The depositors' guaranty law of Oklahoma was enacted to remedy, as far as possible, all of the above conditions, and the guaranty law is an effort to establish confidence in the minds of both depositors and bankers. The question of whether we have done this or not is answered by the following facts:

The officers of the International Bank at Coalgate violated a safeguard of the guaranty law by borrowing about a third of the bank's funds. The bank commissioner took charge of the bank, paid the depositors, reimbursed the guaranty fund, and, as far as the guaranty fund was concerned, the incident was closed. The depositors of the Coalgate bank were not the least bit excited. One farmer telephoned into town that he was too busy to come and get his money and for them to leave his check with a neighbor. All of the depositors received their money; all business conditions were unchanged.

The bank cashier at Afton absconded with $23,000 of the bank's funds. His bond was on file with the state banking board and has since been collected. After an examination of the bank's affairs by an assistant bank commissioner, the depositors were told that the bank was solvent; and the bank is doing a nice business to-day, not having been embarrassed for a moment after the examination.

A bank officer at Ravia was arrested on the charge of embezzlement, and although considerable talk was made in the community in regard to the official being in jail, the bank did not lose a dollar of deposits, and, with the exception of the officer being removed from the board of directors by the bank commissioner, the bank was not affected.

The Columbia Bank and Trust Company, the largest bank in the State of Oklahoma, a bank with over $3,000,000 liabilities, was closed on September 29, 1909, by the bank commissioner because the capital of the bank was impaired and its assets not in condition to be readily converted into cash. It was after a conference of two days' duration between the bank commissioner, the state banking board, and the officers of the bank, the newspapers in the meantime carrying articles relative to the sale of the bank, the gossip among banks extending as far away as Kansas City, that it was decided best to close the bank and pay the depositors. The morning papers carried a statement from the bank commissioner requesting the depositors to call and receive their money from the closed bank. Over a million dollars of individual deposits of Oklahoma City were in this bank. This bank acted also as reserve agent for 112 banks. There could not have been a worse time for a bank to break in Oklahoma City. The cotton season was just beginning; the annual state fair opened the day the bank closed; and the failure of the bank under the old banking methods meant at least the tying up of the funds of several thousand citizens of Oklahoma City, together with disturbing the business of 112 banks. Commercial men from out of the State who happened to be in the city on the day of the closing of the bank wired their houses, but the calamity did not arrive. Two hours after the bank commissioner began paying the depositors business conditions in the city were absolutely normal.

The fair was the greatest success in the history of the fair association, and the deposits in Oklahoma City to-day are greater than they have ever been, deposits in state banks increasing as regularly as they did before the failure. There was never a semblance of a riot, not even one policeman being in evidence. Conditions around the bank were not changed from any other business day around a busy bank.

In addition to the guaranty fund the banking board called an emergency assessment of only three-fourths of 1 per cent, and all the individual depositors have been paid. Ninety-six per cent of the bank's deposits have been paid and enough cash in sight to pay the other 4 per cent, and if 60 per cent of the remaining assets of the bank, together with the assets turned over to the banking board by the stockholders of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company are liquidated, the guaranty fund will not only be reimbursed, but the three-fourths of 1 per cent emergency assessment collected from the banks will be returned.

Following the failure of the Columbia Bank and Trust Company the bank commissioner closed the First State Bank of Kiefer, because this bank had about $20,000, or an amount equal to twice the capital of the bank, on deposit with the Farmers' National Bank of Tulsa, which failed. The president of the Farmers' National Bank of Tulsa was also the president of the First State Bank of Kiefer, and kept all the available funds of the Kiefer bank, except the cash, on deposit with his national bank at Tulsa.

The bank commissioner paid the depositors of the Kiefer bank immediately, while the Farmers' National Bank of Tulsa remained closed.

An Italian laborer at Kiefer, amazed at the fact of receiving his money from a bank that failed, cabled the news to the old folks in Italy.

Some evidence of the fact that the guaranty law has promoted confidence in the minds of our citizens is that while the bank commissioner has lowered the rate of interest that can be paid on deposits from the prevailing rate of 6 per cent, before the law went into effect, to the rate of 3 and 4 per cent, that the deposits in state banks have steadily increased from $18,000,000 to about $51,000,000.

The difference in the rate of interest paid by the banker has paid his assessments to the guaranty fund, and it has been a matter of choice with the depositor where he placed his money, for in many instances he can still deposit his money with national banks at greater rates.

As a matter of evidence that the bankers have confidence in the guaranty law, 94 national banks have denationalised and converted into state banks. Four state banks have nationalized since the law went into effect.

The deposits of the national banks that converted into state banks were about $8,000,000, which is included in the $33,000,000 increase above mentioned, and the deposits in state banks to-day are about $10,000,000 greater than the deposits in national banks in this State.

You will remember that when the guaranty law went into effect the deposits in national banks were about twice the amount of the deposits in state banks. You will also remember the feeling prevailed that a national bank was the safest place to transact business, and that this idea had been prevalent for years. This sudden change of sentiment should denote a remarkable confidence in the guaranty law.

As to the criticisms of the guaranty law, most of these are made by politicians, and the conclusions given are made without any study of conditions. For instance, it is stated that the guaranty law promotes wild-cat banking, and it would be safe to say that some of the most conservative and best bankers in the United States are operating under the Oklahoma guaranty law. In the first place, a man can not be active in a bank in Oklahoma until he has been approved by the bank commissioner, and his neighboring bankers are willing to give all the information they have in regard to him, for they are interested in the guaranty fund. The banker knows that if a reckless, dishonest, or incompetent man goes into the banking business in Oklahoma, that while a run will not be made on his bank because of the failure of the other bank, yet the guaranty fund may be disturbed.

Again, the capital of a bank in Oklahoma must be paid in full before the bank may open for business, and isn't a man in the banking business in Oklahoma, who has invested his own money, in exactly the same condition as a banker opening a bank in any other State? Why should he desire to lose the money he has invested in the banking business? The bank can not get top-heavy, for the deposits are limited to ten times the amount of its capital and surplus.

With the bank commissioner approving the character of the banker, the banker putting his own money into the capital of the bank, interest on deposits limited, deposits limited to ten times the amount of the capital and surplus, the banker denied the right to borrow the funds of his bank, where is there any chance for the wild-cat banker to operate?

If the guaranty law prevented a run on the bank at Afton and the bank at Havia, it was by the confidence it gave our citizens.

If we prevented depressed business conditions at Oklahoma City and left the business of that city in as normal condition as it was before the Columbia Bank and Trust Company closed, then the guaranty law has been a great benefit to our State.

If the above incidents show that we have established confidence in the minds of depositors and bankers, then the guaranty law has been a success.

Sincerely, yours, C. N. HASKELL, Governor.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Utah will permit, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Let that be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the postal savings-bank bill has been vigorously assailed on this floor as being unnecessary, unwise, and unconstitutional. I do not agree with these criticisms in any particular. On the contrary, I believe the proposed legislation to be beneficial, wise, and clearly within the constitutional authority of Congress. I do not intend to enter upon any extended discussion of the merits of the bill. The luminous and instructive speeches which have been delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] upon that subject render it entirely unnecessary that I should occupy the time of the Senate upon that branch of the question. I simply desire to indicate in the briefest possible terms some of the reasons why I believe the legislation will prove beneficial to the country.

First. The effect of it will be to afford banking facilities to people throughout the country, and particularly in the rural and sparsely settled localities where no such facilities now exist.

Second. The people of limited means who are not in the habit of patronizing banks will patronize an institution of this character. There are many people in this country who are afraid of a bank, but who have every confidence in the Government of the United States. That class of people would have no hesitation in patronizing an institution of this character carried on in the Post-Office Department, when they would hesitate to patronize the ordinary banks of the country.

Third. In time of panic, money which may be withdrawn from the banks in large measure will be redeposited in these post-office depositories instead of being hoarded away, and in that manner money will be retained in the channels of trade.

Fourth. The measure will encourage habits of thrift and economy among the people.

Fifth. It will encourage patriotism and personal loyalty by giving every depositor in the post-office a personal and vital interest in the welfare of the General Government.

Sixth. Contrary to the opinion announced here by some of the Senators opposed to the bill, the legislation will not encourage socialism, but I think will operate as a discouragement of socialism, because the effect of it is to give each man his individual property, to which he is adding from time to time, and the result will be to promote individualism instead of socialism.

Seventh. Instead of hurting the banks, it is my judgment that ultimately it will help them. In the first place, the Government itself by depositing these funds in the banks will itself set an object lesson of confidence in the banks which will not be lost upon the people.

I think the result of it will be that after the depositor has been adding to his account from time to time and the amount has reached the maximum allowed by law, or something like the maximum allowed by law, the depositor will take his deposit to a savings bank where he can obtain a larger amount of interest than he would by allowing it to remain in the post-office banks. I think the result in that way will be to help the banks, and particularly the saving banks, of the country instead of being a detriment to them.

Eighth. The effect of this legislation will be to restore to circulation large sums of money which are now in hiding and to prevent further sums from going into hiding, and that will be so particularly in times of panic. The effect will thus be to steady the currency, to promote the circulation of money, and to facilitate trade by keeping an adequate supply of money in circulation.

But, Mr. President, it is not sufficient that this proposed legislation should be beneficial; it must also be constitutional. An unconstitutional law is worse than no law, because it makes a promise of benefit incapable of fulfillment.

It has been asserted upon this floor by eminent lawyers that this bill is so clearly unconstitutional that for anyone to seek warrant for it in the Constitution is to engage not only in an impossible but in an utterly foolish undertaking. I listened with great interest and with great delight, as I always do, to those Senators when speeches were delivered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to this general effect. I will confess that I was somewhat overwhelmed and somewhat dismayed at the vigorous and confident denunciation of this measure by those Senators, because it brought home to me a realization that if they were correct the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who reported the bill, and those who are aiding and abetting him in the nefarious attempt to write it into the statute books, were engaged in a flagrant and reprehensible conspiracy against the Constitution, the accomplishment of which would be to inflict sundry and divers mortal wounds upon that ancient and honorable document. There seemed to be no excuse for the assault. It was wanton and willful, with malice prepense and aforethought. It occurred to me that I must either satisfy myself that the Constitution was in no danger of annihilation or withdraw from the unholy enterprise in order to avoid being held up to the scorn of my constituents as an accessory before the fact.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator amplifies on the constitutional questions raised here, I have been interested in the summary he has given of the different points practically where this measure would be advantageous. In his list twice he has referred to his belief, as he states, that in time of panic the operation of governmental postal savings banks would be beneficial.

The Senator is a thoughtful man and considers matters carefully. Let me ask him whether he has fully considered what has seemed to some of us not a salutary part of the bill, but a dangerous part, and that is its effect upon existing institutions in time of panic. The Senator believes that the establishment of these postal savings banks at a time of panic would be salutary and beneficial and not injurious to existing savings institutions.

I saw the operation, if the Senator will allow me, in the great panic of the conservative force, the public confidence, displayed and shown in state savings banks. In my own State, where the deposits have steadily increased and represent the earnings, accumulations, and savings of tens of thousands of people deposited in the state savings banks, in the time of the disastrous panic of 1907 not one of those institutions went to the wall. There was no raid upon them. There was no demand for their deposits.

Has the Senator thought of this: If at that time there had been governmental postal savings banks, with the guaranty of the Government, and, with what the Senator brings out very clearly, the natural dependence of the public upon the Government as against private institutions, what would have been the result if there had been throughout Maine a system of governmental postal savings banks? What would be the result if the alarm and panic which then pervaded the country arose again?

My fear has been that the very establishment of a governmental postal savings system would be an inducement to the depositor in the local savings bank to withdraw his deposit and put it in a governmental institution, and thereby in my State scores of great savings banks, instead of being saved by this competition, would go to the wall.

I am trying to find my way to vote for the best measure that can be devised after proper amendment in this case; but I have this danger, which I have tried to outline to the Senator before he goes into his constitutional argument. I would like him to tell me and to tell the Senate whether there would not be that element of danger to existing institutions in time of panic which would encourage a temptation and disposition to withdraw from the state institutions and to deposit in the governmental institutions, which, of course, would mean practically the destruction of the state institutions. I suggest that to the Senator as a practical possible difficulty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I recognize the force of what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says with such clearness. Of course, nobody can predict with absolute certainty as to just what the result of legislation in every particular is going to be. After all, I can only guess at it, just as others can only guess at it; but it seems to me that the result which the Senator fears is not likely to occur. In time of panic——

Mr. PAGE rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment, if the Senator will permit me to finish. In time of panic, as the Senator from Maine has already said, the savings banks of the country generally have not suffered because the people of the country have had confidence in those banks. There has been ordinarily no run upon that class of institutions.

Mr. CARTER. They are protected by the fact that notice of withdrawal must be given.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. The Senator from Montana suggests that one reason is that notice of varying lengths of time must be given before the money can be withdrawn. But perhaps there is a deeper reason than that, and that is the underlying confidence of the people in that class of our institutions.

It seems to me that if the people of the country have sufficient confidence in the savings banks of the country that they will not withdraw their money in time of panic to hoard it away; they will not withdraw it for the purpose of putting it into a governmental depository where the amount of interest that will be paid to them is far less than is paid by private institutions. Ordinarily the amount of interest so paid is about 4 per cent—from 3½ to 4 per cent. If a man's mind is in a state of panic, he will withdraw his money and hoard it away, even though he loses the entire amount of interest; and if it is not in a state of panic sufficient to induce him to do that, it occurs to me that he will not do it for the mere sake of depositing it in the post-office, where he will obtain a smaller amount of interest.

Mr. HALE. In time of danger, in time of panic, the depositor does not think so much of the interest which he is to get as whether or not he will lose his entire investment. Interest usually disappears in the mind of the depositor, and as the Senator says, he will either keep it on deposit and take his chances in the state institution or he will withdraw it and hoard it, thereby losing his interest. Will not that tendency, which the Senator brings out very clearly, be immensely accelerated and increased if he can put it into a governmental institution, though the interest is smaller than what he is getting from his bank? Will he withdraw it and hoard it away? Will he keep it in his old conservative institution or will he hurry to deposit it with the Government, in which he has confidence, at a lower rate of interest?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I would hardly care to assent to the proposition that that tendency will be immensely accelerated. I am inclined to think that it may be accelerated to some extent, but I do not think that that condition is sufficiently important to overcome the vast benefits that would otherwise be conferred by this bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been very thoroughly considered, and the provisions of the bill have been framed in the light of the question. It is true that absolute security will induce deposits; and certain Senators in the course of this discussion, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], not as advocating that idea, but merely suggesting it, raised the question as to why a limitation should be placed upon the amount of a deposit to be received during a given month. "If it is a good thing," said the Senator from Georgia, "to permit a person to deposit $100 during a month, why not permit that person to deposit $100,000, if the person so desires?" The answer to the Senator from Georgia is presented by the question of the Senator from Maine.

The committee considered a state of panic and the effect of this bill upon that condition. It was believed that in time of panic large depositors could take collateral or make certain accommodations with the banks in order to leave their deposits with the banks. Small depositors could not, in the nature of things, do that. Being numerous and the sums being small, it would be quite impracticable to enter into any relation of deposit with collateral. The purpose of the bill is to avoid making the post-office a convenience, in time of panic or at any other time, for large commercial transactions. Therefore it will be found that the bill limits the aggregate deposits that any one person can make to the sum of $500, plus accumulated interest; and a further limitation is contained in the bill restricting the deposit in any one month to $100.

It will be perceived by the Senator from Maine and other Senators interested that in a case of extreme panic, where the public mind happens to be in a disturbed and distorted state, that no one individual could deposit in a post-office more than $100 during that period of hysteria, which would probably pass in a month, and if in two months he could deposit only $200. But what would happen with the $100 taken out of the bank and deposited is the question.

Mr. HALE. A good many $100.

Mr. CARTER. A good many $100. They would pass back to the banks in the community from the postmaster each and every day, so that the financial equilibrium would be maintained in the community by the interjection of the Government as an agency there. We were compelled during the panics of recent years—we have had a good many money flurries—to distribute government money all over the country for the purpose of steadying conditions.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Montana ought to say "in certain parts of this country."

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the major portion of the deposits was made in the chief reservoirs of cash; but I know that, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, every bank designated as a depository was supplied with all the money which its collateral warranted, and in some cases the amounts were increased.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will bear in mind that that interposition of the Government, which undoubtedly was valuable, possibly saved the day.

Mr. CARTER. It saved the day, undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE. It possibly saved the day. The savings banks got none of the benefit of that. They kept on in their steady, modest, solvent course, and got no benefit from the Government. They maintained their condition.

I want to apologize to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who has the floor, for interrupting him and arresting his most interesting argument.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Maine will realize that the savings banks in New York, at least—and I think in many other States—took advantage of the law, which permitted them to make rules requiring notice of withdrawals. I think that right to exact thirty days', sixty days', or ninety days' notice before withdrawal saved the day in the State of New York quite as much as did the government deposits.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], but I am very anxious to proceed.

Mr. BACON. I want simply to ask the Senator from Utah if he will not let me say one word, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] alluded to a question I asked him. I will not occupy a minute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Georgia will be brief.

Mr. BACON. I will.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has undertaken to repeat the question which I asked him when he first presented this bill; I think it was some weeks ago. I simply desire to say that while he has not stated it with entire accuracy, he has simply enlarged it in the matter of amount. The principle is the same. But the fact I wish to state is this: The question I asked the Senator then had relation to the particular view which he was then presenting, and while it might be a sufficient answer to the question in a general way, the question as I then asked it must be considered in connection with the particular discussion which the Senator was then making as to the particular advantages of the postal savings-bank system. It did not relate to such a question as is now before the Senate, or that particular consideration of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, another thought that is suggested to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], who sits near me, and to which I agree, is that under this bill, when the money is withdrawn, if it should be withdrawn, from the banks and deposited in the post-office depositories, it will be immediately returned to the banks by the Government itself, thus restoring the same money more effectually to the channels of trade than would be the case if the postal-depository institution did not exist.

Mr. SMOOT. Provided that it was allowed to remain there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Provided it was allowed to remain in the banks, of course. Now, if I may proceed with the argument which I had outlined. I yield to no man here or elsewhere in my devotion to the great principles of the Constitution. But, after all, the Constitution is not a fetish before which one must prostrate himself in fear and trembling. It is but the great power of attorney framed by the people for the purpose of enumerating the subjects over which the agency of the Government which they created shall extend and to the interpretation of which we must bring our practical common sense and the usual and ordinary rules by which the meaning of all written language is determined. There is nothing occult or mysterious in the process. The simple question to be propounded and answered is: Does the proposed legislation effectuate in some degree any of the constitutionally declared ends of government by unprohibited means? The vast powers of Congress are enumerated in singularly brief and comprehensive terms. Although they embrace the whole legislative authority of the lawmaking power of the richest and most powerful Nation the world has ever known, they are compressed into less than 500 words. They really do little more than enumerate the subjects upon which Congress may legislate. They constitute only the chapter headings for the vast book of laws which Congress has been writing for more than a hundred years and which Congress will continue to write in great and increasing volume for many hundreds of years to come. And Congress has written and will continue to write into each chapter anything which falls within the scope of the heading, broadly and liberally construed.

Mr. President, there are certain fundamental principles which are no longer open to dispute. Some of them may be briefly stated as applicable to the present question:

1. An act of Congress is valid not only where it operates directly to carry into effect any of the specifically enumerated powers, but also where it can be seen in any degree, or under any circumstances, to promote the operation or efficiency of such power.

2. The specifically enumerated powers declare the ends which Congress is authorized to effectuate. The ends which Congress may lawfully attain are limited by the affirmative provisions of the Constitution. The means which may be adopted to attain the ends are unlimited except by the prohibitions of the Constitution.

Any means may be employed which are fairly and reasonably adapted to bring about the result. The extent to which such means conduce to the end—the degree of their efficiency—the closeness of the relationship between the means adopted and the end to be attained, are matters addressed exclusively to the judgment of Congress.

Whether the end sought to be attained is lawful is a matter of constitutional power and not of legislative discretion; but the lawfulness of the end being conceded, the choice of the means is a matter of legislative discretion and not of constitutional power.

3. The relation between the means and the end need not be direct and immediate.

I am aware of the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in a colloquy which occurred when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] was addressing the Senate, seemed to dispute that proposition; but I think it is clearly determined by the decisions of the Supreme Court that the relation between the means and the end need not be direct or immediate. If the law promotes the efficiency or facilitates the execution of an enumerated power, then it is sufficient.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, but I will not do so if he objects.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not object.

Mr. BACON. The question is in regard to the proposition that he has just passed from, that the end being within the provision of the Constitution, the means are matters not controlled by the Constitution, but within the legislative discretion. I simply wish, by way of illustration and not to press it in the way of argument, to ask the Senator this question. Of course it is recognized as an entirely constitutional function for the Government to perform, to supply the people with a proper amount of currency. I presume the Senator will agree to that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do agree to that.

Mr. BACON. Now, does the Senator go further and agree with the Senator from Texas in the suggestion that, in the furtherance of that purpose and to accomplish that end, Congress could, by a penal statute, require people to put their money into circulation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not agree with the Senator from Texas as to that.

Mr. BACON. Would not that be the means to accomplish it? I simply illustrate the proposition. I have very grave doubts about the proposition myself; in fact, I am prepared to say that I do not believe it; but it certainly illustrates the principle announced by the Senator. There is the end to be accomplished. It is constitutional, and the means which would be effective are the means suggested; and yet nobody would say that such a measure is in the discretion of Congress, if he believed as the Senator from Utah does.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Senator from Georgia overlooks the qualification which I made, namely, that the end being lawful, the means were within the competency of Congress, provided the means were themselves unprohibited by the Constitution; and I amplify that by saying that the means may be prohibited by the Constitution in express terms or by the spirit of the Constitution itself. I undertake to say that it is contrary to the whole genius of the Constitution to permit a law to be passed which will punish a citizen for doing or failing to do a thing which has none of the elements of criminality whatsoever.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator, without pressing the argument, that I do not agree with him at all as to any power being exercised simply upon the ground that it is not prohibited.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that Congress has no right to pass a law simply because it is not prohibited, but what I say is this: Granted that Congress has the right to attain a particular end under an enumerated power, the road which it shall travel, the means which it shall take to effectuate the end, are wholly matters of legislative discretion and not of constitutional law, provided they are unprohibited by the express language or the spirit of the Constitution. That is the proposition.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator's proposition very clearly, and I understand him to draw a distinction between the power to accomplish an end to be controlled by the question whether that end is constitutional or not, and the power to put in motion the means by which the end is to be accomplished.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BACON. In other words, in the one case he must find his warrant in the Constitution, and in the other case he must find it in the fact that the Constitution does not prohibit it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I can not agree with the Senator in any statement of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Georgia may find himself opposed to some pretty respectable authority on this proposition.

Mr. BACON. There are respectable authorities the other way, too.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. This is a very important suggestion, and I would like the Senator to give some authority, because the Senator is in conflict with the opinion in McCulloch v. the State of Maryland.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well——

Mr. RAYNER. Just one moment. The Senator says that if the end is legitimate and the means are not prohibited, the means are within the discretion of Congress. That is the Senator's proposition. That is not the proposition of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch v. the State of Maryland, because, Mr. President, the end must not only be legitimate, the means must not only not be prohibited, but the means themselves must be appropriate and adapted to the end.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but let me give him just a few lines to show that he has left out the two principal elements and ingredients in that case as being essential to the performance of a constitutional duty.

Let the end be legitimate—

Says Chief Justice Marshall—

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

The Senator says let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all the means which are not prohibited are constitutional, but the Chief Justice says that the means must not only be not prohibited, but that they must be appropriate and must be plainly adapted to the end. The Constitution itself says that they must be both necessary and proper, and our contention is that the means here are neither necessary nor proper for the purpose of accomplishing the end in view.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator cites the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, a case with which I am reasonably familiar, but let me direct the Senator's attention to a sentence, which I think follows the extract which he has read. I do not mean immediately follows, but follows in the same case:

> But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power.

Mr. RAYNER. I admit that. So there is no contention upon the point that Congress is the judge of the degree of necessity, but I still contend that the means must be necessary and the means must be proper, because the Constitution says that they must be necessary and proper. The mere fact that the means are not prohibited is not sufficient, because the means must be adapted to the end and must be necessary and proper. There is where the whole issue arises between those who believe that this bill is constitutional and those who do not. Now, I ask the Senator if he thinks the means must be necessary and proper and adapted to the end? If the Senator believes that this bill performs a constitutional function and accomplishes one of the enumerated powers of the instrument, must not the means be not only not prohibited, but must they not be necessary and appropriate and adapted to the end? If the Senator will admit that, then I will admit that Congress is the judge of the degree of necessity; but in the argument the Senator has made so far, he has left out entirely the proposition that the means must be necessary and proper, and has planted himself upon the same proposition that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has, that if the means are not prohibited, we have the absolute discretion to use any means that we desire to use, whether they are necessary or proper or not, or whether they are adapted to the end.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I prefer to put my views in my own language, rather than to assent to the analysis which the Senator from Maryland makes of my views. Some statements he has made with reference to what I have said are correct, and some of them are not correct. I prefer to stand upon the language which I have myself used.

Of course, the means must be appropriate; they must be calculated to effect the end, or else the law does not tend to carry out the power at all. Nobody doubts that; and I have not undertaken to dispute it. I shall have occasion later along to call attention to some one or two authorities which bear out the proposition which I have here laid down.

Now I proceed.

4. If the law carries out any constitutional power, it is not rendered invalid because it also, to a greater or less extent, accomplishes some other result which is wholly beyond the power of Congress to deal with as a separate and independent matter. And I cite McCray v. United States (195 U. S., 27).

5. While it is true that the Constitution continues to speak with its original words and meaning, their scope and application continually broaden so as to include new conditions, instrumentalities, and activities.

If the principles thus briefly stated be granted, the validity of the legislation under consideration logically follows. Within these principles, the law can be justified under—

1. The power of Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

2. Under the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

3. Under the power to establish post-offices and post-roads.

4. If certain proposed amendments are adopted, which I understand are to be offered, under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States by a series of decisions has interpreted the coinage clause to confer upon Congress not only the power to coin money, but to provide and maintain an adequate currency for the country. Under the broad and liberal construction of this power now accepted, it is to be acted upon as though it read: "Congress shall have power to provide and maintain an adequate currency for the whole country, and by appropriate legislation secure the benefit of it to the people."

I call attention to the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall., 533). I read from page 549:

> Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it can not be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit, and base coin on the community. To the same end Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile.

And to National Bank v. Dearing (91 U. S., 29) holding that the act providing for the system of national banks was constitutional, and rested upon the same principle as the act creating the second bank of the United States. The court expressly approves the reasoning of Hamilton, saying:

> The power to creat carries with it the power to preserve. The latter is a corollary from the former.

The General Government, therefore, being charged with the duty and responsibility of providing an adequate currency for the country, and being the only Government charged with such duty and responsibility, it may accomplish this duty by any means plainly adapted to that end. The Constitution is to be construed so as to enable Congress to adopt any means which will fairly and reasonably conduce to make the powers granted by the Constitution operative, and among the means it may select without restriction such as it determines will best effectuate the end. The selection of the appropriate means by Congress is wholly a question of policy and expediency, without limitation at the hands of the judiciary.

Under the power to regulate commerce, for example, Congress has provided for improving harbors, for building piers and breakwaters, for erecting an astronomical observatory, for making coast surveys, and has sent out expeditions to observe an eclipse. None of these can be regarded as acting directly upon commercial transactions. They affect commerce only by way of rendering it safer or more profitable, or by adding to the facility with which it may be carried on.

After an exhaustive review of the authorities, Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on the Constitution, at section 268a—and I invite particular attention to this language, because by it the author sums up the decisions of the Supreme Court, as I think, upon this question—says:

> If a particular measure has such a connection or relation with one or more of the enumerated powers granted to Congress or to the Government that it can be seen in any degree or under any state of circumstances to promote the efficiency of such power, * * * then the measure is within the competency of Congress to enact. That body alone is the judge of the closeness of the relation or the extent and degree of the efficiency.

And the author says a little later, in the following section I think, that if it has a tendency to bring about the end contemplated by the express power it is valid.

Thus, for example, the creation of the national-bank system was not an act by which money was borrowed, but an act which facilitated the power to borrow money by creating a demand for government securities; and it was held that the relation to the borrowing power was sufficiently close to warrant the legislation.

In the Legal-tender cases (12 Wall., 457) the court laid down this doctrine:

> There must be some relation between the means and the end; some adaptedness or appropriateness of the laws to carry into execution the powers created by the Constitution. * * * The rules of construction heretofore adopted do not demand that the relationship between the means and the end shall be direct and immediate.

Now, within those principles, what does this bill accomplish? Among others, the effect will be to restore to circulation large sums of money that otherwise would remain in hiding. I do not care whether it is a half billion, or, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says, a mere bagatelle of a few millions. The amount of money which it will restore to circulation only affects the degree of the efficiency. It does not affect the validity of the law.

It has been estimated by the Postmaster-General and by others who are competent to make an estimate, that there are in the neighborhood of a half billion dollars which this bill will bring out of hiding and restore to circulation. If so, it will have a most important effect upon the currency of the country. It assists in the most vital way in bringing into circulation and providing for the people an adequate supply of currency.

The Constitution not only devolves upon Congress the power to provide a currency for the country, but denies the power over the subject to the States.

Congress is, therefore, the only body competent to deal with the matter, and as money is an absolute necessity in the operations of government, as well as the private affairs of the people, it necessarily becomes the constitutional duty of Congress to provide and maintain a sufficient supply at all times.

This being so, it likewise follows as a logical necessity, that Congress has plenary authority to select any and all appropriate means to this end. If the supply becomes inadequate, the power exists to increase it. Confessedly this may be done by coining more money and thus adding to the volume in existence.

I am unable to perceive any good reason why Congress may not in its discretion expand the volume of available currency by passing laws reasonably calculated to bring into circulation the money which has gone into hiding. Money, so long as it is hoarded away, is in practical effect money destroyed.

A law which results in bringing such money into the channels of trade, in substance and effect creates money quite as effectively as does the placing of the government stamp upon a piece of gold or silver or paper.

At any rate, such a law secures the benefit of the currency to the people by rendering it available for use as a medium of exchange, which constitutes its only function and brings the law within the principle of the doctrine of the Supreme Court already stated:

> The power to create carries with it the power to preserve. The latter is a corollary from the former.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in the Legal-tender cases, places the power of Congress to provide for issuing Treasury notes upon the ground, among others, of—> the necessity of providing a proper currency for the country, and especially of providing for the failure or disappearance of the ordinary currency in times of financial pressure or threatened collapse of commercial credit.

And again that learned justice says:

> When the ordinary currency disappears, as it often does in times of war, when business begins to stagnate and general bankruptcy is imminent, then the Government must have power at the same time to renovate its own resources and to revive the drooping energies of the Nation by supplying it with a circulating medium.

If the Government has power, "when the ordinary currency disappears," to fill the place of this ordinary currency by a substitute circulating medium (and we have the opinion of this eminent justice affirming the power) it is a little difficult to understand why the Government does not possess the power by appropriate legislation to restore, if it can, the ordinary currency itself to circulation instead of resorting to the expedient of providing a substitute. The former would seem to be a more direct method of accomplishing the result than the latter.

Such action falls clearly within the words of the Veazie Bank case already quoted, namely:

> Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it can not be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation.

But it is argued that money is property, and the owner has the right to hoard it if he pleases, and that Congress has no more power to coax the owner to restore it to circulation than it has to punish him for hoarding it. This brings me to the question of the Senator from Georgia submitted a few minutes ago. The suggestion was made by the Senator from Texas; and lest I may misquote him upon that subject I will insert in the RECORD, without stopping to read it now, exactly what he said upon that question during the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Maryland and myself. The Senator from Texas, in reply to a suggestion which I made upon this subject, said:

> The Senator from Utah also understands there was a divided court in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno. But I waive all that, and I admit that it is not only the right, but the duty, of the Government to supply the country with a sufficient volume of currency. But I deny that in the performance of that duty the Government can act on anybody except itself. If it is true that the Government has the power to bring this money out of hiding by enticing it from its hiding place, it has the power to bring it out by punishing the man who hides it. The Senator from Utah would not contend that a statute making it a crime for a man to bury or lock up his money would be within the competence of Congress; and yet if Congress possesses the power to keep the money in circulation after it has issued it and possesses the power to act upon those who are disposed to keep it at their homes in any way they please, then it must have ample power, because, the power granted, all the courts say it is plenary, and it is sufficient to fulfill its purpose.
> I think nobody would be willing to say that the Congress of the United States could make it a crime if I choose to lock up my money or if anybody else chose to do so.

This argument carried to its logical conclusion accomplishes its own refutation. The Government has the right, and exercises it continuously, to invite its citizens to do things which it has no power to compel them to do. In time of peace we have no power to compel people to loan their money to the Government, but no one doubts our authority to induce them to do so by making it worth their while. We coax the citizen to loan his money by paying him interest, but we are without power to compel him to loan it under a penalty.

We may pay a man for his services to the Government, but except in the case of the war power we can not make it a crime if he declines to enter the Government service.

That is all I desire to say with reference to the money clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Utah pardon me for just a minute?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say I am very fully of the opinion that Congress would not have any power to endeavor to force money into circulation by making it penal for a man to hoard it; but my proposition is this: When the Senator states his proposition as broadly as he does, that the question of the means is one without limitation and one in the discretion of the legislative department, it must follow that if the legislature should, in its wisdom or unwisdom, so determine, it could, according to the argument of the Senator, enact a penal statute against the hoarding of money. We do not differ as to the conclusion that there is no such power, but we differ as to the reasoning by which we reach that conclusion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Georgia, I think, will agree with me that Congress has the power to invite people to do things which it has absolutely no power to compel them to do.

Mr. BACON. The Senator certainly did not hear me or I was extremely unfortunate in my expression if I did not state the fact that I agreed with him fully in that; but I had simply used it as an illustration of what I conceived to be the fallacy of the Senator's argument; for, if his argument is correct, that it is a power in Congress, restricted alone by its discretion, then if Congress should in its discretion think such a law was conducive to furnishing the country with a sufficiency of currency, it would be within the power of Congress to do it, if it is an unlimited power, restricted only by its discretion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I misunderstood the position of the Senator from Georgia. I understood him to agree with the Senator from Texas upon that question, and not with myself.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not; and I do not know that the Senator from Texas intended it more than as a matter of illustration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will put the exact quotation from the speech of the Senator from Texas into the RECORD, so that it will speak for itself.

Now I come to the commerce clause, and I intend to discuss that very briefly. The same facts which I have stated in order to justify this legislation under the money clause will likewise justify it under the commerce clause—that is, the fact that it will restore to the channels of trade and keep in the channels of trade large sums of money that otherwise would remain in hiding.

The relation between commerce and money is very close and intimate. Commerce among the States and with foreign nations at this stage of civilization is impossible without money. This was clearly pointed out by Mr. Webster in his speech on the payment of the surplus revenue, where he said in substance that the duty of the Government with respect to the currency does not consist in merely taking care that the gold and silver coin be not debased; that this duty is further to regulate commerce and trade, and—> consequently to exercise oversight and care over that which is the essential element of all the transactions of commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask a question for information. As I understand, the Senator is of the opinion that we would have the power to enact this legislation under the interstate-commerce clause for the purpose of bringing into circulation this money and putting it in commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Putting it in the channels of trade.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, what would be the necessity of a coinage clause at all? Why should we not provide a currency under the interstate-commerce clause?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not absolutely certain, in that view of it, that the coinage clause would be necessary. Very often clauses of the Constitution overlap one another, and very often we pass laws as a means to carry into effect a particular express power, when we might pass them directly under some other express power itself. I think the law can be justified under both clauses upon precisely the same state of facts.

Mr. BORAH. I asked the question to get the view of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to quote a few words more from this same speech of Mr. Webster, and I make no apologies to the Senate for doing so, because I think everybody agrees that perhaps no man in all the history of this country had a profounder and a truer conception of the real meaning of the Constitution than that eminent gentleman. He says:

It is, in my view, an imperative duty imposed upon this Government by the Constitution to exercise a supervisory care and control over all that is in the country assuming the nature of a currency, whether it be metal or whether it be paper; all the coinage of the country is placed in the power of the Federal Government; no State by its stamp can give value to a brass farthing. The power to regulate trade and commerce between the United States and foreign or Indian nations, and also between the respective States themselves, is expressly conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government. It is clear that the power to regulate commerce between the States carries with it, not impliedly, but necessarily and directly, a full power of regulating the essential element of commerce, namely, the currency of the country, the money, which constitutes the life and soul of commerce.

And in his speech on the currency, on September 28, 1837, he declared that it was the constitutional duty of the Government to see that a proper currency, suitable to the circumstances of the times, and to the wants of trade and business, as well as to the payment of debts due to Government, be maintained and preserved; a currency of general credit and capable of aiding the operations of exchange, so far as those operations may be conducted by means of the circulating medium.

And again in the same speech, speaking directly with reference to the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, he said:

This is a full and complete grant, and must include authority over everything which is part of commerce or essential to commerce. And is not money essential to commerce?

And again:

If Congress, then, has power to regulate commerce, it must have a control over that money, whatever it may be, by which commerce is actually carried on. Whether that money be coin or paper, or however it has acquired the character of money or currency, if, in fact, it has become an actual agent or instrument in the performance of commercial transactions, it necessarily thereby becomes subject to the regulation and control of Congress. The regulation of money is not so much an inference from the commercial power conferred on Congress as it is a part of it. Money is one of the things without which, in modern times, we can form no practical idea of commerce. It is embraced therefore, necessarily, in the terms of the Constitution.

So Mr. Webster replies to the question which the Senator from Idaho a moment or two ago addressed to me, that the power is really embraced in the commerce clause.

Mr. BORAH. It does not seem to me that Mr. Webster does reply to the question I asked. The question I asked went to the proposition why it was necessary to have any coinage clause at all. Therefore it would seem to me to follow, whatever reasoning one may adopt at this time, that the framers of the Constitution evidently did not have in mind that under the power to regulate commerce the Congress could regulate the currency.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator asked the direct question, but I understood it to carry with it the implication that it rather confuted the argument which I had been making, because if I was correct about it, the coinage clause was not necessary.

Mr. BORAH. No; I asked the question solely for the purpose of getting the Senator's view upon the question, without expressing views of my own one way or the other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One of the strongest arguments for the establishment of the United States Bank was that it had a natural relation to the regulation of interstate trade. Mr. Hamilton said, in his report to Washington on the constitutionality of the bank, that it was the regulation of commerce among the States—

In so far as it is conducive to the creation of a convenient medium of exchange between them, and to the keeping up a full circulation by preventing the frequent displacement of the metals in reciprocal remittances. Money is the very hinge on which commerce turns.

I will put into the RECORD, without stopping to read it, a most luminous statement upon this general subject by Judge Marvin, of the court of appeals of New York, in the case of the Metropolitan Bank against Van Dyck, in which the constitutionality of the legal-tender law was upheld under the commerce clause. Whether he was right in that I will not undertake to say, but I call attention to his discussion upon the subject of the intimate relationship between money and commerce. Among other things, he said (pp. 510–511):

Now, what is commerce? I need not stop to look up and quote definitions. We know that it consists in the exchanging of property, or the buying and selling of commodities; the latter, as generally understood. And so understood, it can not be carried on without money. In the absence of money it must substantially perish; something called "money" must exist. It is a necessity to commerce; an aid always attendant upon it; and the power that regulates commerce should, theoretically, be the exclusive power to create money, to say what shall be money, the representation of values, and it should have the power to regulate its quantity; not that such power, by way of changing the quantity, should be often or capriciously exerted. The language of the Constitution is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers." It is argued that these powers are not broad enough to embrace the case we are considering—the power expressed is limited to regulating commerce, and this only "with foreign nations and among the several States;" that Congress can only regulate, not create, and that it can not even regulate commerce within the States. Commerce was never created by a mere act of legislation. It must have production to supply it with materials to be sold and bought. But legislation may protect the products of labor, may stimulate and encourage labor, and furnish money, making it easy to buy and sell property. It may, by many regulations of commerce, cause industry to take such direction as to produce the materials for commerce. Regulation of commerce with foreign nations may be productive of great individual and, consequently, national wealth or great poverty. And the same effects may follow regulation of commerce among the States. Money is necessary to commerce. And the kind of money and the quantity may be, indeed are, direct regulators of commerce. Without money there would be no commerce; with certain kinds of money, such as Lycurgus established—iron, there would be little commerce.

Now, it is proposed—and I pass from the commerce clause—to amend this bill, as I understand, by inserting in it an amendment which will read substantially as follows:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit or welfare of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the bank and invest the same in bonds or other security of the United States.

If that amendment should be adopted, it seems to me it makes it perfectly clear——

Mr. BACON. Is that an amendment which has been proposed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is an amendment; I am not certain whether it has yet been offered. I am reading from the report in a morning paper, which quotes the amendment and undertakes to say it will be offered. I understand such an amendment will be offered later on; perhaps to-day.

If that amendment should be adopted, then it seems clear to me that it renders this legislation entirely constitutional under the borrowing clause of the Constitution.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me ask the Senator a question. If that is so, which of course I could not admit, would you entitle this bill "a bill to borrow money upon the credit of the United States," or "a bill to create postal depositories?"

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think it makes the slightest difference what you label the bill; the question is what the bill itself provides. You can not make an unconstitutional law constitutional by putting a constitutional title to it.

Mr. RAYNER. Then, can you make a law constitutional by tacking onto an unconstitutional power some other power that is constitutional? Admitting now for the sake of the argument that the creation of postal depositories is not authorized by the Constitution, can you make it constitutional by tacking on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States? Does that make it constitutional? That gives me my difficulty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will answer the Senator's question by saying sometimes you can and sometimes you can not.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator give me a minute, because I understand the Senator from New York intends to offer an amendment of this sort? I want the Senator's opinion about it. He has examined it carefully. Let us assume now that a bill to create postal savings banks, without anything else at all, is unconstitutional. Could you say that to permit the money to be invested in United States bonds would make it constitutional?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it does.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, the object of this bill is not to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. There is not a Senator here who would pretend to say that the object of this legislation is to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. If the United States wanted to borrow money, it would not create postal depositories for the purpose of borrowing it; and I use the word in no disagreeable way at all when I say that to say that this bill is a bill to borrow money on the credit of the United States is a pretext, because we are not here for the purpose of enacting any legislation to borrow money for the United States. We are here to create postal depositories. This bill is entitled "A bill to create postal depositories;" the object of the bill is to create postal depositories; and if you once admit that the creation of postal depositories, standing by itself, is unconstitutional, but that by tacking on to it some one of the enumerated powers you may make it constitutional, then you may tack on to any unconstitutional bill some constitutional measure which does not come within the purview or meaning of the bill and make the entire legislation constitutional. My judgment is this: I may be mistaken——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Just a moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator will not make a speech.

Mr. RAYNER. This may save me the necessity of inflicting a speech on you to-morrow.

The Supreme Court would say this: If those two powers are dependent upon one another, the whole legislation would fall. If you have an unconstitutional provision and a constitutional provision, the one dependent upon the other, then the whole legislation is unconstitutional, and you can not separate it. It would be impossible to separate it.

Therefore, I stand upon the proposition that you can not take something that is unconstitutional, confessedly so, and just tack on to it, for the purpose of making it constitutional, some enumerated power which does not come within the meaning of the legislation and which does not meet the purposes the legislation would effect.

The Senator from Montana would not dare to rise in this body and say that the object of this bill is to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. I respectfully issue to him a challenge to tell the Senate that the object of this legislation is not to create postal depositories; that that is not its purpose; that its title is false; that its sections are all misleading; and that the real and genuine object of the bill is to accomplish the enumerated power of borrowing money upon the credit of the United States.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Montana will answer the question, but as briefly as possible.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I will be very brief.

The Senator from Maryland will concede at once that the relation of debtor and creditor arises between the depositor in the postal savings bank and the Government of the United States. Therefore the Government is a borrower of the money. The borrowing right is not dependent upon the judicious use of the money after it has been borrowed.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator will allow me, I admit if it is a bill to borrow money upon the credit of the United States, you can not inquire into the fact as to what the Government will do with the money after it has been borrowed; but the question I asked the Senator in absolute good faith is this: Is the object of this legislation to enable the Government of the United States to borrow money? Is that the purport of the legislation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me answer the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. I think the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The object of a law is not determined by what the Senator from Maryland thinks is its object or what the Senator from Montana or what the Senator from Utah thinks is the object of it. The object of it, when we come to consider the question of its constitutionality, is to be determined by the law itself. The court will not inquire into the operations of the mind of the Senator from Maryland or of any other Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, has the Senator finished?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not finished. I undertake to say that if this amendment is put on the bill it does bring it within the borrowing clause, and does make it essentially a different bill than it was before. Conceding for the sake of the argument, and merely for the sake of the argument, that without this clause it would be unconstitutional, I think the addition of this clause would render it constitutional, because the effect of it is to use the post-offices of the country for the purpose of gathering money for the uses of the Government in time of stress, in time of war, and in other cases of exigency of that character, and it gathers the money in that way as truly as the United States Bank did or as the national banks do, and will therefore facilitate the borrowing power.

Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Assuming that this amendment was not adopted, is there any question but that under the provisions of the bill, if there should come into the possession of the United States $100,000,000, not to be returned in kind, but simply creating a general obligation of the United States to make good these deposits, and war should break out or any other national exigency arise, Congress could appropriate that money for it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not the slightest.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, that money being in the Treasury and subject to appropriation by Congress, does it strengthen the bill to-day to reiterate in the law what would be in the law if it was not there in express terms?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It strengthens it only by declaring in express words what would otherwise probably be implied from the language of the bill.

Now I come to the last branch of the discussion, which is that this legislation is justified under the post-office clause.

The post-office clause of the Constitution is very brief. It provides simply that—

> Congress shall have power * * * to establish post-offices and post-roads.

Literally interpreted, this would mean nothing more than the power to establish places in the various communities of the country for the reception and distribution of the mails, the various routes over which the mails should be carried, and to fix the charges of the Government for its services. But evidently, and of necessity, it includes much more. Under this clause the great Post-Office Department has been organized and carried on and brought to its present vast proportions and multiplied activities. The clause means and is acted upon as though it said:

> Congress shall have power to establish, organize, and define the functions of a postal department.

In no other way can we justify the powers now exercised by that department under the acts of Congress, such, for example, as the authority given to the Postmaster-General to negotiate and conclude postal treaties and conventions with foreign countries (R. S., 398), providing for the issuing of money orders, both foreign and domestic, and so on.

The Constitution of the United States was not made alone for those who adopted it. It was made for those who came after them and for those who will come after us. True, it was said in the case of Dred Scott, and has been many times repeated, that the Constitution speaks not only with the words of the framers, but with their meaning; that it means now what it meant then. This is quite correct. The words of the Constitution have not changed in meaning, but their application and scope have broadened. They apply to new conditions, new things, new activities which have arisen since the Constitution was adopted. A constitution incapable of adaptation to the constant growth and constant change of a progressive and constantly changing people would be a useless and an impossible contrivance, serving only to hamper, and not to promote, the development of a free people.

Chief Justice Waite, in the case of Pensacola Telegraph Company v. Western Union Telegraph Company (96 U. S., 1), said:

> The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances.

The same thought was expressed in broader terms by Chief Justice Marshall, in the great case of McCulloch v. Maryland, when he said that the Constitution was—> intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.

In the case of Debs (158 U. S., 564) the Supreme Court said:

> Constitutional provisions do not change, but their operation extends to new matters as the modes of business and the habits of life of the people vary with each succeeding generation. * * * The Constitution has not changed. The power is the same. But it operates to-day upon modes of interstate commerce unknown to the fathers, and it will operate with equal force upon any new modes of such commerce which the future may develop.

In Martin v. Hunter (1 Wheat., 304) Mr. Justice Story said:

> The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigency of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications which at the present might seem salutary might in the end prove the overthrow of the system itself.

In the very recent case of South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 437), Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking of the Constitution, says:

> Being a grant of powers to a government, its language is general, and as changes come in social and political life, it embraces in its grasp all new conditions which are within the scope of the powers in terms conferred.

Mr. President, this is in accordance with the universal law of language. The meaning of words, in one sense, does not change, but the application of words grows and expands with the growth and expansion of society. We do not always find it necessary to coin a new word or a new phrase to express a new condition or a new activity. Old words may be found sufficiently flexible to include new things, new conditions, and new activities. Take, for example, the provision conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. The framers of the Constitution never dreamed that it would be expanded so as to include the multiplicity of things which it undeniably includes to-day. In the beginning the generally accepted meaning of the power was that it extended only to the interchange of commodities among the States. It was not regarded as applying to transportation or the instrumentalities of transportation except as such transportation and the instrumentalities thereof were connected with navigation. Transportation by land was only dimly, if at all, regarded as being included. Transportation by water was undoubtedly what the framers had chiefly in mind. Carriage by land was of the simplest possible character, requiring no regulation at the hands of the Federal Government and little, if any, regulation at the hands of any lawmaking power. But all this was changed by the advent of the railroad, by the invention of the telegraph and the telephone. The power has been gradually extended, until to-day it is recognized as embracing everything which is the subject of trade and every instrumentality and means by which trade among the States is carried on or facilitated. It is not unreasonable to look forward to the day when, with the perfection of aerial navigation, it will include the regulation of the aerial craft and the air itself, so far as may be necessary to regulate commercial intercourse among the States by this future method.

In the same way, the postal department, the post-office, and post-road to-day include vastly more than they did in 1787. In the early period of the Government it was contended that this power extended no further than to permit Congress to designate the location of the various post-offices and the various post-roads. In practical construction—the correctness of which no one any longer doubts—it includes not only the power to designate where the post-offices shall be, but to build and equip them; not only to designate post routes, but to build or authorize others to build and improve them.

What constitutes a post-office or a postal department is a practical matter. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the phrase had no judicial meaning, and has none to-day, like many of the words and phrases in the Constitution. When the Constitution speaks of an ex post facto law, of the writ of habeas corpus, of cases at common law or cases in equity, of admiralty, and so forth, the meaning is precise and can be accurately determined, because they are all expressions which had received a judicial interpretation. But the phrase "post-office or postal department" has no judicial or legal meaning. What functions may be properly devolved upon such a department must be primarily and within reasonable limits for Congress itself to determine. Congress has heretofore determined that the issuance of money orders was a proper power for the Post-Office Department to possess. In view of the fact that the reception and safeguarding of savings is, and has been for many years, regarded as appropriately belonging to the post-office establishment in all the civilized countries of the world, I am unable to see why the Congress of the United States may not likewise consider this an appropriate function of the postal department which Congress is authorized by the Constitution to establish.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I desire to ask him in this connection a question, which I asked him once before, when he made the same argument in the Senate on this bill. The argument of the Senator, as I understand it, is that the fact that other countries, which I will remark, by the way, are not restrained by written constitutions, have recognized that the incorporation of the postal savings bank upon their system constituted a legitimate part of the post-office business of that country, had enlarged in the world's understanding the meaning of the post-office department, and, therefore, that enlargement having been recognized in other countries, it could with propriety be recognized in this country as a legitimate part of the business of the Post-Office Department.

The question which I asked the Senator before, which he will recall—and I ask him now in order that he may give me the reply he did before, or such modification as he may desire—was this: Suppose that other countries—European countries, for instance, where they have no written constitutional limitation of this kind—should consider that the taking of fire insurance or of life insurance was something which they could conveniently engraft upon their post-office system, and all the countries of Europe should engraft it upon their post-office system, would that make it a matter which, in our constitutional view, and on that account, could the Government of the United States enter into the business of life and fire insurance through its Post-Office Department, using its machinery for that purpose?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already stated, Mr. President, that the functions which might properly be devolved on the Post-Office Department are primarily and within reasonable limits for Congress itself to determine. Now, I can conceive of cases where the function is so entirely foreign to the post-office establishment that all men would agree immediately that it had no proper relation thereto.

Mr. BACON. But as I understand it——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Whether or not the case which the Senator puts falls within that category I am not able to say. I am rather inclined to think that it would go beyond the reasonable power of Congress.

Mr. BACON. But the entire question as to what was reasonable or unreasonable, I understand the Senator's argument to be, would be one entirely within the discretion of Congress. Therefore, necessarily and logically, anything which Congress may think legitimate business to engraft upon the business of the Post-Office Department could, under the Constitution, be so engrafted——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. If Congress approved it and thought it legitimate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I have not so said.

Mr. BACON. Who is to determine, if Congress does not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not so said, and I do not so say. It must bear some relation to the department itself. It must be in some degree appropriate.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, it must have some appropriate relation to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I say is, in determining the question as to whether it does bear an appropriate relation to the Post-Office Department, we can consider what other countries of the world regard in that particular simply as a circumstance which throws light upon the question and not as a controlling circumstance.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think that the business of a safe-deposit bank bears any legitimate relation to the business of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the creation of this particular savings depository does bear a legitimate relation to it.

Mr. BACON. For other reasons, though, not because it bears any relation to the business of carrying the mails.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The proposed law provides that the money may be deposited in one post-office and it may be withdrawn at another post-office. It is a way of transmitting the money through the mails, perhaps not as clearly as the transmission by post-office money order, but it is of that same general character.

Mr. BACON. That is not the purpose of the bill. The Senator would not say that that is the purpose of the bill. That is a mere incident. The purpose is to create a safe-deposit bank.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, throughout the centuries the river flows from the mountains to the sea; always it is the same river, but those who live upon its banks are not always the same people; and so yesterday it carried upon its waters only the primitive canoes of the first proprietors; to-day it floats the merchant fleets and the invincible navy of the foremost Nation in all the files of time.

So, Mr. President, with the Constitution. The Constitution is always the same Constitution, but the people who live under it are not always the same people. When it was first adopted it had relation to and covered the small affairs and the simple problems of the handful of people who inhabited the 13 sparsely settled States along the Atlantic seaboard. But to-day it is extended so as to hold within its meaning the vast problems, the vast affairs, the imperial domain of 90,000,000 of people living in 46 tremendous Commonwealths stretching from ocean to ocean, bound together by shining bands of steel, upon which moves a commerce mightier than that which plows the seas.

Every student of constitutional history knows, in spite of any mere philosophic theorizing to the contrary, that while the words of the Constitution are the same to-day as they were in 1787, their scope and application have been and are being vastly extended by practical, by legislative, by judicial interpretation so as to include the new instrumentalities, the new conditions, and the new activities which have come into existence since that day. Written by the pens of wise men, or carved with the swords of brave men, these extensions have been made; and, approved by the practical common sense of a patriotic and progressive people, who have always realized that the Constitution was made for them and not they for the Constitution, these constantly broadening applications have been woven into the very fabric of the Constitution as strongly, firmly, and indisputably as the words of that great instrument themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. I propose an amendment to the bill, which I ask may be read and lie upon the table and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, on page 1, after the word "for," insert "carrying out the provisions of this act in reference to;" on page 7, line 9, after the word "deposit," insert "with the Treasurer." Strike out all after the word "States," in line 12, page 7, down to and including the word "California" in line 3, page 8, and insert the following proviso:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, a war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13410) to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its first amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and to the amendment of the Senate as to title; and agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
M. G. BULKELEY,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

RECLAMATION FUND.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5705) to authorize the issue and sale of certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. The amendment has been read.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be again read.

Mr. SHIVELY. Has the amendment been read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was read on a previous day, but not to-day. Does the Senator ask to have it read?

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete government reclamation projects heretofore begun, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, to transfer from time to time to the credit of the reclamation fund created by the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, such sum or sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000,000, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary to complete the said reclamation projects and such extensions thereof as he may deem proper and necessary to the successful and profitable operation and maintenance thereof, or to protect water rights claimed by the United States; and such sum or sums as may be required to comply with the foregoing authority are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the sums hereby authorized to be transferred to the reclamation fund shall be so transferred only as such sums shall be actually needed to meet payments for work performed under existing law.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of providing the Treasury with funds for such advances to the reclamation fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $50 or multiples of that sum; said certificates to be redeemable at the option of the United States at any time after three years from the date of their issue and to be payable five years after such date, and to bear interest, payable semiannually, at not exceeding 3 per cent per annum; the principal and interest to be payable in gold coin of the United States. The certificates of indebtedness herein authorized may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, giving all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commission shall be allowed and the aggregate issue of such certificates shall not exceed the amount of all advances made to said reclamation fund, and in no event shall the same exceed the sum of $30,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall be exempt from taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the certificates of indebtedness issued under this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 3. That beginning five years after the date of the first advance to the reclamation fund under this act, 50 per cent of the annual receipts of the reclamation fund shall be paid into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States, until payment so made shall equal the aggregate amount of advances made by the Treasury to said reclamation fund, together with interest paid on the certificates of indebtedness issued under this act and any expense incident to preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

SEC. 4. That all money placed to the credit of the reclamation fund, in pursuance of this act, shall be devoted exclusively to the completion of work on reclamation projects heretofore begun as hereinbefore provided, and the same shall be included with all other expenses in future estimates of construction, operation, or maintenance, and hereafter no irrigation project contemplated by said act of June 17, 1902, shall be begun unless and until the same shall have been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and approved by the direct order of the President of the United States.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize advances to the 'reclamation fund' and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate in the discussion of this bill. When orginally we passed legislation looking toward the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands, it was intended that the proceeds of the public lands in certain States should be used for the purpose of reclaiming those lands. It was not then contemplated that the Government at any time in the future would indorse bonds for the purpose of carrying out those projects. I fear, in the near future, that expenditures for this purpose will reach from fifty to sixty million dollars per year, and that we shall go into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this legislation.

I doubt if Congress has the right to go into the Treasury of the United States to take money and go into any State for the purpose of reclaiming lands. In fact, I do not believe Congress has any such right. Some of my constituents came to me and wanted me to introduce a bill to drain some valuable swamp lands in my State. I replied promptly that if those lands belonging to the State of Georgia were drained, they would have to be drained by the treasury of our State. For one, I was exceedingly anxious to aid States where such lands were located in reclaiming them and preparing them for agricultural purposes. I was willing to take the proceeds arising from the sale of those lands and apply them to such purposes; but I have said that when it comes to the Government of the United States undertaking to indorse bonds for this purpose, it is a very serious matter.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLAY. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. This does not seem to me a question of the indorsement of bonds, but it is a question of issuing bonds directly.

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Government does not simply take the collateral security here, but the Government just issues these bonds as bonds, calling them certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that; but I understand also that this bill provides that this indebtedness shall be paid by the proceeds of the sale of public lands that will become valuable, the friends of this measure say, after the projects are put in operation.

Mr. President, I fear that a policy of this kind when it is begun will lead further every day. I fear the time will come in a few years when we shall take $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 from the Treasury every year to be applied to this purpose.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think if the Senator would take the time to look over the proposition, he would find that his fears are groundless in that respect, because with this temporary aid, this loan, if you please, to help over the hill, there is money enough coming in from the sale of this land and other lands not only to repay the Government in full, but to provide for all of the future work of this kind contemplated, and finally in the end to leave a large sum of money to be otherwise disposed of by the Government.

Mr. CLAY. I have understood the friends of this measure, which comes with a favorable report from both sides of the committee, to say, I believe both publicly and privately, though we never refer here to matters that are spoken of privately, that this is the last time they intend to come to Congress and ask the Government of the United States to assume any further responsibility in completing and in keeping in repair these projects.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia knows that this is the first time——

Mr. CLAY. And I hope it will be the last.

Mr. WARREN. And we are assuming that it will be the last. I hardly think that we should assume, because we ask one time, that it is the commencement of a series of requests of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. What I am after is to see if we can not get the records to show——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me a moment further, I wish to say that this is simply a loan which must be paid. A man who would borrow money because he could would be a bad financier; the man who would borrow money when he did not need it would be a bad financier; and the man who borrows money and expects to pay it hardly expects, having borrowed what his needs compelled him to borrow, that, having paid that loan, he will borrow again because he can.

Mr. CLAY. I do not know how much money it is going to take annually to keep these projects up, and I do not know whether or not you want to extend them further in the future.

It is true that the proceeds of the public lands belong to the people of the United States; but those lands are without any value unless they are reclaimed. I concede that; and I have always had sympathy for the Senators and for the population of the States where those lands are located, but I do believe it to be bad policy on the part of the Government of the United States to undertake to go into the States and spend money for purposes not connected with the National Government. We can not do this unless we place these projects where the government lands are located. That is the only way we are allowed to do it. But, I tell you, there is a sentiment growing in my State and there is a sentiment growing throughout the length and breadth of this country, that the people can come to Congress and get money for almost any purpose—for purposes for which they ought not to expect Congress to provide.

Think of coming to Congress and asking Congress to drain the swamp lands in a State, belonging to the State, or belonging to private individuals! Mr. President, such a bill was pending here at one time, and I received telegrams and letters from my State asking me to give it my hearty support, but I replied: "No; Congress has no right to do any such thing."

My experience here has taught me—an experience of thirteen years—that when you start a project you go step by step in your expenditures until there is no ending of them. We sat here during the last session of Congress, when the leader on the other side of the Chamber told the Senate that we were spending $50,000,000 per year more than we ought to expend, and that he expected at the next Congress to see the expenditures reduced $50,000,000.

The same distinguished Senator stood here the other day and told the Senate and the country that we were spending $300,000,000 a year more than we ought to spend, and that if he were running the Government he would reduce the expenditures $300,000,000 per year, though I do not know how he would do it; I confess that I am unable to see.

Mr. BAILEY. Some folks say he is running the Government.

Mr. CLAY. My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] said that. I did not. My friend from Texas said that the distinguished Senator was running the Government, and therefore he ought to reduce the expenditures of the Government $300,000,000 per year. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we have heard the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] say that this is the first time they have asked the Government to indorse the scheme of making payment to complete these projects. I do not believe we ought to take this step; but I am not going to interpose any further objection to the measure. I do believe we ought not to have started as we have to-day. I fear, however, before my term expires in this Senate, Senators from the arid section will be before this body asking more money for more projects of the same character.

Mr. President, we are absolutely becoming reckless in regard to expenditures. We are getting to such a point in the history of this Government that we can not stop them, and I am not prepared to say that it is confined entirely to the other side of the Chamber. You have seen your post-office expenditures reach $240,000,000 per year. I have been informed by a prominent member of the Naval Committee that this year our naval bill will be in the neighborhood of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty million dollars. You talk about reducing the expenditures of this Government, and yet you increase your naval expenditures from fifteen to twenty million dollars every year. You can not make any reduction in your legislative bill. It applies to salaries. You can never make any great reductions in regard to your expenditures until you take a knife and go into your naval bill, into your army bill, into your postal bill, and examine critically and see where expenditures can be stopped. I do not believe expenditures can be reduced $300,000,000 per year. Frankness compels me to tell you that you may create all the business commissions you wish, but my experience and observation in the Senate teach me that every effort we make to reduce expenditures costs more than the reductions that are brought about in the general expenditures. Your commission to look into the expenditures will cost more than the reductions you will get in your general expenditures.

You will never get reductions in your expenditures in the Post-Office Department until your Post-Office Committee shall spend weeks and months in ascertaining whether or not there are any surplus employees; whether or not we are paying too much money for railway-mail pay; and if there are any dead weights in the Post-Office Department, let them be lopped off. If there are any employees that are not needed, then say so. If you are going to increase your naval expenditures as you have been doing in the last ten or fifteen years, they will reach $225,000,000 per year. I believe in a strong navy; but there ought to be an end of extravagant expenditure. Our expenditures last year were a billion dollars; and I predict that when this session of Congress ends, they will be more than a billion dollars—a small amount more than that.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of saying anything except to express my views in regard to this new departure. We are now using the Treasury of the United States to the extent of $30,000,000 to reclaim arid lands. It was never contemplated before that we should use the Treasury for any such purpose, and I hope, Mr. President, this will be the last time we shall attempt to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the statement that this bill comes from the committee with a unanimous report, including Senators of both political parties, is true; but I want the RECORD to show that I did not attend that committee meeting. Senators do not generally think it to their credit to announce their absence from committee meetings, but I refrained from attending because the policy which the Government has adopted with respect to its lands is not a policy which I think a wise one.

Twenty years ago, or near that time, when I first entered the Congress of the United States, I felt that the proper disposition of the public lands was to convey them to the States in which they are located. I felt, then, that they would never be a source of revenue to the Government; that the cost of administering and disposing of them would finally absorb the net proceeds from their sale, and I felt, therefore, that the interest which other States might have in them was contingent and most remote. But that view has not prevailed in Congress, and we have held them for ourselves, withholding them from the States.

I myself believe that if the Government is to keep the public lands until it can dispose of them on its own account and for the benefit of the common Treasury, this legislation, or some legislation of this kind, is not only wise, but absolutely necessary, because obviously it will be impossible to sell these lands unless they are first made susceptible of some good use. Otherwise we would have a vast estate, yielding no revenue to the Government, and affording no homes for the people. It, therefore, seemed to me that it was a simple case and a clear case of the Government improving its own lands in order that it might dispose of them to the best advantage.

Of course I do not conceal from myself the fact that the Senators from Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming are very much more interested in making these lands tillable and valuable to their people than they are in returning any revenue from them to the Government. They make no concealment of that either before the committee, before the Senate, or before the country; and yet, while for that purpose I would not vote a penny out of the common Treasury, still, the Government owning them, is under an obligation to take the best care of them, because, treating it as a case of a guardian or an administrator, it ought to preserve the estate and even spend money on it, if by doing so it can render it more valuable.

But, Mr. President, that is not my view of the matter. I should like to give every acre of these public lands to the States in which they are located. I believe the States could administer them not only more wisely and more economically, but they would make more suitable arrangements according to the situation of their own people. I want to go on record joining my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] with the suggestion—and I record the suggestion in the hope that it may prevent it from coming to pass—that before we are quite through with this there will be an appeal to Congress to remit the price of these lands.

I remember we sold some lands to an excellent people in a Territory which has since become a State—it is not necessary to designate it further than that—and before they had their lands improved they were before Congress with an application to be released from the payment of the purchase price. I hardly think human nature is very different in the Far West from what it is in the Middle West. It seems to be a common belief among men that whatever they can get out of the Government it is just that much made, forgetting that the Government can give nobody anything unless it first takes it from somebody else. In the bare hope that this prophecy which I record may serve to prevent its coming to pass, I make it.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I have objected from time to time, when this bill has been considered, to its provision in reference to the manner in which the money should be expended; but as I am the only member of the committee who objects to it, the other members of the committee being of the opinion that it is properly safeguarded, I will not urge my objection any further. I am in favor of the issuance of the obligations of the Government to carry on this work. The only question in my mind is whether or not it should not be limited to certain projects, rather than to a general placing of the fund so that it may be used in any part of any project.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a word before the vote is taken. I want to express my accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. We wrangle, Congress after Congress, and have been doing so for a long time, and if conditions do not change, we will wrangle to the end of time over matters affecting the public lands, when we are here thousands of miles away from the subject-matter of consideration, and a large majority of those who sit in Congress have never seen or come in contact with the conditions about which they legislate. It is an enormous waste of time and an enormous waste of money. The expenditures of the Government of the United States connected with the administration of the laws governing its public lands have many times outweighed the price of the land. I hope that Congress in some sane moment will realize that the proper and the best place to rest the ownership and the responsibility and the disposition of the public lands is with the legislative and executive governments of the States in which those lands are situated. Men who see them every day—legislatures, composed of men from every section of the State, with an intimate personal knowledge and as clean and capable a conscience as we can boast of in this body—should have the disposition of that question, and they will accomplish the ultimate, primary, and highest purpose. They will secure human beings to settle upon and live on those lands and build up a community that we never can successfully build up at this great distance.

This measure is necessary at this time because of the lack of intimate knowledge in the Congress of the United States when they enacted the legislation upon which this bill is based, and also because of the fact that the Congress of the United States, on account of its want of knowledge in regard to local conditions, has made this legislation necessary by starving the fund from which the expenses of these irrigation problems were to have been paid. When they withdrew from sale and settlement 200,000,000 acres of land, they depreciated the fund that was to contribute to the carrying out of these reclamation projects. I am heartily in favor of the bill and shall vote for it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes."

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 to the bill (H. R. 18681) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate No. 5 to the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the House has agreed to all the Senate amendments to the bill with the exception of Senate amendment numbered 5. We have investigated the amendment, and I think our investigation justifies us in asking the Senate to recede from the amendment. I therefore move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. RAYNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4399) for the relief of Maj. Pierre Stevens.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senate having temporarily laid aside the unfinished business, I ask that it resume consideration of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the regular order. The request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is equivalent to an objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the word "numbered," to strike out "226, 227, 228, 229, 230," so as to make the section read:

All of blocks numbered 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 292, 293, 294, 295, 349, 350, 380, 381, 382, 461, 575, 576, reservation A, reservation B, reservation C, reservation D, reservation 12, according to the official plat of the city of Washington, not already owned in whole or in part by the Government of the United States of America.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 4, after the word "payment," to insert "for or on account;" after the word "of," to insert "the price of;" and in line 5, after the words "lands or," to strike out the words "the acceptance or," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used for the payment for or on account of the price of said lands or acquiring the title thereto, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. PIERRE C. STEVENS.

Mr. RAYNER. I desire to call up for immediate consideration the bill (S. 4399) for the relief of Maj. Pierre C. Stevens.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Maj. Pierre C. Stevens, paymaster, United States Army, $4,000, being an amount stolen from government funds in his possession at San Juan, P. R., while a major and additional paymaster, United States Volunteers, and which amount he made good from his private funds on or about November 18, 1899.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask from what committee the bill comes?

Mr. RAYNER. The bill comes from the Committee on Claims with a unanimous report. It is recommended by the Judge-Advocate-General, and it is recommended by the Secretary of War. I understand Major Stevens is the only paymaster in the United States to-day who has not had money thus stolen refunded. He paid his money to the Government. In other cases the money has been refunded. The bill comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims, and, as I say, it is recommended by the Secretary of War and the Judge-Advocate-General. It was ten years ago that the money was stolen.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the bill. I only wanted to know from what committee it came. I am a member of the Claims Committee, and I was absent at the last meeting, when it must have come up.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. In order that the postal savings-bank bill may be in better form for consideration to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, with the amendments heretofore made and all amendments proposed, be printed, with appropriate type indicating the status of the various amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minues spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 3, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 2, 1910.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 2, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This being calendar Wednesday, the call rests upon the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to the fact that House bill No. 13517, reported from the Committee on Claims, for the relief of Thomas J. Akins, assistant United States treasurer at St. Louis, has been placed upon the Union Calendar. I want to ask whether that ought not to go upon the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will later on lay the bill before the House after calendar Wednesday's business has been disposed of, or to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I just simply did not desire to waive any of my rights——

The SPEAKER. This being calendar Wednesday, no business is in order under the rule except the call of committees.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Not even to inquire whether a bill has been placed upon the proper calendar?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has inquired, and there is no difficulty in arriving at the matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I did not desire, Mr. Speaker, to do more than call attention to the facts, so as not to waive any rights I may have in the matter.

Mr. MANN. You could make the point of order if the bill was called up.

MODIFYING THE ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SECOND AND ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOURTH ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may submit a conference report, so that it may be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any particular hurry about this?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not especially, except it has to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, let it wait.

The SPEAKER. It being a conference report, the Chair would submit the question for unanimous consent, because it is in the ordinary transaction of business of a high grade. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report (No. 667) and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13410) entitled "An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its first amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and to the amendment of the Senate as to title; and agree to the same.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
M. G. BULKELEY,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

Statement of the House conferees to accompany H. R. 13410, an act to modify the One Hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War.

The first amendment struck out the words "of the army" and radically changed the policy of the Government, and the Senate recedes.

The second amendment simply repeals article one hundred and twenty-three, as the article was virtually repealed by the change in articles one hundred and twenty-two and one hundred and twenty-four, and the House recedes.

The House also recedes from the amendment to the title.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Conferes on the part of the House.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The call rests upon the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk began by calling the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Banking and Currency was not called.

The SPEAKER. It has just this moment been called.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Chair announced that the call rested with that committee, but the Clerk never called it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has just called the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GAINES. The Chair corrected the Clerk, and the Clerk has just now called the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If he did, he called it after he called the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. Then he called it in error, because the call does rest upon the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I understood.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk called the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures through error, and the Chair directed him to call the Committee on Banking and Currency, where the call rested, and the Clerk did call the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right, I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committee again.

BRIDGES ACROSS ESCAMBIA BAY, CHOCTAWHATCHEE RIVER, AND APALACHICOLA RIVER, FLORIDA.

When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 6051.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6051) to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to reconstruct, maintain, and operate its railway bridges across the Escambia Bay, Choctawhatchee River, and Apalachicola River, in the State of Florida.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company is hereby authorized to reconstruct, operate, and maintain its bridges on the line of railroad between Pensacola and River Junction, in the State of Florida, to wit: First, its existing bridge over Escambia Bay; second, its existing bridge over Choctawhatchee River; third, its existing bridge over the Apalachicola River; all in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MORRIS AND CUMMING CHANNEL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 19633.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a House bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19633) to authorize Aransas Pass Channel and Dock Company to construct a bridge across Morris and Cumming Channel.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Aransas Pass Channel and Dock Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Texas, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Morris and Cumming Channel, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Aransas Pass, in the county of San Patricio, in the State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the constructon of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MORRISON CHANNEL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 21221.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls up a House bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21221) to authorize the city of St. Joseph, Mich., to construct a bridge across Morrison Channel of the St. Joseph River, Michigan.

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of St. Joseph, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Morrison Channel, of the St. Joseph River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of St. Joseph, in the county of Berrien, in the State of Michigan, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE CUTTER AT KEY WEST, FLA.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 1381.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1381) to provide for the construction of a revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of Key West, Fla.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of Key West, Fla., at a cost not to exceed the sum of $250,000.

Also, the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide and equip two new revenue cutters at a cost not exceeding the sum of $250,000 in each case; and when either of said revenue cutters shall be placed in service, one of the revenue cutters now in the service shall thereupon be retired from service.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized from time to time to make such transfer and change of stations of revenue cutters as he may deem desirable for the best interests of the service, and in his discretion to direct any revenue cutter to cruise in any waters to perform the duties of the Revenue-Cutter Service."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide two new revenue cutters, and for other purposes."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill, and consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, when a bill is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it is considered under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to get an explanation from the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first section of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, will there be opportunity for general debate?

The SPEAKER. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say, is there no opportunity for general debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection is, and he is confirmed in his recollection as to its correctness, that if this bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, there would be general debate. But unanimous consent having been given for its consideration in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the precedents are that general debate is not in order. That is the difference between consideration in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk will read the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of Key West, Fla., at a cost not to exceed the sum of $250,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the Clerk is reading the bill or reading the substitute.

The SPEAKER. There is a committee amendment pending to the bill. It has already been read. Unless a reading is demanded, it will not be read again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there is any use for this proposed expenditure?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the two gentlemen will give me an opportunity to state the reason for the bill before they ask their questions, I will be glad to answer any questions afterwards.

Mr. Speaker, there are now pending in the House six different bills, already passed by the Senate, each bill for the construction of a revenue cutter. There are also pending in the House a number of House bills providing for revenue cutters. Each of these bills provides for a cutter to be located on some particular station. One of the Senate bills pending is the one now reported back to the House. That provides for a revenue cutter to take the place, practically, of the revenue cutter now at Key West, for ocean use in the Gulf of Mexico.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, stated that there was a necessity for doing away with four of the revenue cutters now in existence. They are old and not capable of going out to sea in storms when it is necessary for them to do so. The department also recommended additional launches for the Revenue-Cutter Service. Our committee, on consideration, concluded that it would not be wise to report all of these bills providing for revenue cutters for the various stations and that it would not be desirable to report for the four revenue cutters to take the place of the four which the department is desirous to discard. We finally concluded that we might limit the number of cutters to be favorably reported at this time or at this session of Congress, and probably at this Congress, to two new cutters of such character that they would be capable of ocean service in storms; and then added a provision which would give sufficient authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to change the stations of the cutters now in existence. For instance, while the cutter at Key West may be and is not capable of performing the duties which ought to be performed at that place, it may be sufficient to perform duties at some other place, where it does not have to come in contact with strenuous ocean service. Therefore we have provided for two cutters, with authority to the Secretary to change the station of the cutters as he may please, putting one of the new cutters in one place and putting one of the old cutters now out of duty and incapable of performing proper service in its place.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Have they as many cutters as they need if they were all fit for business?

Mr. MANN. They have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And your idea, or the scheme of this committee, is to replace the old ones that are practically worthless with new ones?

Mr. MANN. Yes; practically, but not entirely, worthless.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are you going to do with the old ones when you get through with them?

Mr. MANN. Under the authority of law the Secretary now possesses, the old cutters are sold.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman give the names of these useless cutters?

Mr. MANN. One is the Forward. I would not say altogether useless, but useless in a measure. One is the Woodbury, another the Perry, and another is the Rush. The Forward is located at Key West, the Woodbury on the coast of Maine, the Rush in Alaskan waters, as I recall it.

Mr. SHERLEY. What are the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the purchase of two new cutters?

Mr. MANN. The recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report was that we provide cutters in place of these four cutters.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not the recommendation that we should provide new cutters when the revenues of the country warranted it?

Mr. MANN. That is not my understanding of the recommendation.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is exactly mine, and we have recently——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service, when before the Committee on Appropriations last week, stated that they did not want these revenue cutters at this time unless the revenues of the country would justify, and that was the recommendation of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we had the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service before our committee. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended a larger number of revenue cutters in his report. I am certain that no one wants revenue cutters or any expense to the Government unless the revenues of the country justify the expenditure.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to interrupt him there?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What will be the cost of these revenue cutters?

Mr. MANN. The limit is $250,000 for construction and equipment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For two or apiece?

Mr. MANN. Apiece. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the connection is past now. I wanted to state in connection with what the gentleman from Minnesota had just said, that one of the prime purposes of revenue cutters is to aid in the collection of revenues and to prevent defrauding the revenues.

Mr. TAWNEY. Another purpose is to aid Members of Congress representing districts in which the revenue cutters will be located.

Mr. MANN. This bill has nothing to do with Members of Congress, because we have adopted the policy here of providing two revenue cutters, without locating them at particular stations, although I have no doubt whatever that one of these cutters, if constructed, will be located at Key West, because the necessity for it there is greater than at any other place. We have now no cutter on the Gulf of Mexico which is able to go out in the Gulf in time of storm.

Mr. FASSETT. Will the gentleman explain a little more fully the reason for this new provision allowing a change of station. It seems to me very important.

Mr. MANN. The reason is to permit the department to get the best service out of the cutters.

Mr. FASSETT. Is it a permanent change, or from time to time?

Mr. MANN. It would authorize the department from time to time to make the changes, as the needs of the service warrant, and will permit the department, when it puts in service a new ocean-going cutter in place of some cutter now on the station which is incapable of performing that service, to utilize the other vessel so far as may be possible by transfer.

Mr. FASSETT. It does not have that power now.

Mr. MANN. It has not that power now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand the gentleman to say that if the department builds a new vessel and puts it in commission, and the department has another vessel that is not valuable for certain work, which might be utilized for something else, it can not utilize the old vessel for anything?

Mr. MANN. The law under which these revenue cutters have been constructed provides for revenue cutters at particular points, on particular stations. The law now authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to change, to put any revenue cutter in service anywhere, so far as the collection of customs is concerned; but he can not change the station for any other purpose, and, practically, he has no authority to change the stations of cutters.

Mr. FASSETT. A station being one of several grand divisions of the service?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this is the time for the Government to enter into any unnecessary expenditure. Notwithstanding the fact that we were told some days ago by high authority that we probably would not have a deficit in the revenue at the end of this fiscal year, I see the Treasury reports that are published from day to day continue to predict a deficit in the revenue of something like $22,000,000, even after the money from the sale of the Panama bonds has been paid into the Treasury.

Now, if that is a fact—and I assume that it is, as it is in the Treasury statement day after day—it is certainly not a time for Congress to make any unnecessary expenditures of the public money. I think, of course, it is necessary to keep up this Revenue-Cutter Service, and if it were shown to the House that a necessity existed at this time, I would not hesitate to vote for the necessary appropriation to build new revenue-cutter vessels; but it does not appear to me from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that there is an urgent demand on the part of the Treasury at this time for the building of these vessels.

I have no doubt that the vessels now in commission are growing old, as all vessels do. As a matter of fact, any vessel is somewhat in danger when it goes to sea in storms. The gentleman does not say that any board of survey have examined these vessels and reported them unseaworthy. He does not bring in a report from the Treasury Department to show that these vessels can not perform their services in protecting the revenue at this time. Under these circumstances I do not think it wise for Congress to make an appropriation of nearly half a million dollars toward building some new revenue cutter when the urgent necessity is certainly not shown at this time. I shall therefore vote against this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. In support of that motion I wish to say that I make it because of information recently obtained from the head of the service and from the Secretary of the Treasury that there is no necessity for increasing the number of vessels in the Revenue-Cutter Service in order to meet the efficiency of that service. When before the Committee on Appropriations last week the chief of that service, Captain Ross, was asked, in effect, whether or not the vessels in the Revenue-Cutter Service to-day were sufficient to meet the requirements of that service and whether the service was performing its duties efficiently. His answer to both propositions was in the affirmative. Knowing that this bill was pending, he was asked by myself and other members of the subcommittee in regard to the necessity of these two vessels and the conditions under which the recommendation of the Secretary was made. He said:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Have you recommended the authorization of any new vessels for the service?

Captain ROSS. The construction of any new vessels?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Captain ROSS. The department has recommended new vessels when the revenues of the Government are such that they can be built.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Have you recommended some additional vessels for the service?

Captain ROSS. We have recommended two additional vessels for the service.

Mr. NORTON. With the limitation that the Captain mentioned. I would like to answer that, if I may, Captain. The Secretary has endeavored to see to it that recommendations were made in that way; that whenever the revenues of the Government permit the vessels might be constructed. In other words, the Secretary has not committed himself to a building programme for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the present condition of the revenues?

Mr. NORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does he think under the present condition of the revenues, which is known to him, that Congress should now authorize the building of two additional vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. NORTON. Well, that question has not been directly answered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Regardless of the condition of the revenues, in view of the statement of the Captain that the service is efficient for its purposes, what I wish to know is, are there any vessels recommended by the department?

Mr. NORTON. There is somewhat of a contradiction. The Captain said that the service was entirely efficient, but not all of the vessels are entirely adapted to the work they are called on to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed, in the light of this testimony and in view of the present condition of the revenues of the Government, which are known to every Member on the floor of this House, to increase the expenditures from the Federal Treasury by appropriations for the next fiscal year to the extent of half a million dollars. I submit that when the administration, as well as this House, is endeavoring to keep down expenditures, and as far as possible keep those expenditures within the estimated revenues of the Government, that a stronger and greater necessity than that which has yet been given to this House should be shown before the House authorizes the expenditure of half a million dollars for this purpose.

The appropriation bills that have been reported to this House thus far during the session, as well as those passed by the House, are $19,000,000 in excess of the estimates submitted by the department. If this rate of appropriation and authorization is continued throughout the session, when the end of the session is reached and the summary of all the appropriations is made up, we will find that we have authorized the expenditure of a great deal more money than the administrative department of the Government has asked for. In view of these facts, I trust that the motion that I have made to strike out the enacting clause will prevail.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, the calendar shows that on February 15 the bill was reported. It also shows that February 19 it was placed on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. February 21 it was stricken off that calendar, and, as I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the hearings before his committee do not show that the Secretary of the Treasury nor any of his subordinates have asked for this measure. Also, the hearings have been very recently held.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is true.

Mr. PRINCE. If that be true, there ought not to be but one result, and that is to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. To oppose the motion.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, all the information that my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations succeeded in extracting was before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They did not make a discovery so far as the world is concerned; they may have learned something new themselves, but not so far as our committee was concerned.

It is undoubtedly true that the Revenue-Cutter Service will continue in existence if these cutters are not provided, and if half of the cutters now in the service should sink to the bottom of the sea, the Revenue-Cutter Service would still continue in existence, but inefficiently. One of the vessels which we have recommended in the end to be abolished has been in the service more than forty-five years. Another has been in the service for twenty-four years. We all know that on the Gulf of Mexico there are violent storms. Many of our own light-houses and life-saving stations have been swept away, and yet there is now no revenue cutter on the Gulf of Mexico which is capable of going out to sea in time of storm.

We have three vessels there, not one of which is capable of going out to sea in stormy weather, and if the distinguished Committee on Appropriations will stop appropriating money for the repair of old vessels, we will save money enough to rebuild all the vessels that we now have in the Revenue-Cutter Service. We spend more money on the repair of old vessels every year than would be necessary to construct a first-class new revenue cutter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman inform the House how many vessels are in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. MANN. Forty-four or 45.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the expenditures for repairs will cover all of these 44 or 45?

Mr. MANN. They would.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Amounting to how much—$75,000?

Mr. MANN. Amounting to how much—the gentleman does not know how much it amounts to——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seventy-five thousand dollars a year, and——

Mr. MANN. Because the Committee on Appropriations, in making appropriations for the Revenue-Cutter Service, have not properly guarded the appropriations, and much money appropriated for this service is used for the repair of vessels, although nominally it is called for the maintenance of the service.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is $120,000 in the general fund and $75,000 for specific repairs.

Mr. MANN. Now, we will soon get some more. One of them has given it as $75,000 and another adds an additional $120,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did not allow me to finish my statement. I was about to state that the specific appropriation for extraordinary repairs is $75,000——

Mr. MANN. For years our committee, and Congress at its advice, has resisted the effort to add new revenue cutters, because we thought we might continue to get along; but the time has come when, if the Revenue-Cutter Service is to perform its duty, it must make provision for efficient cutters to go to sea.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time has been exhausted on this motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. This motion is a peculiar motion, to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nobody making the point of order that debate is exhausted, and I suggest the Chair need not become too officious on this occasion.

The SPEAKER. Nevertheless, the Chair can recognize the gentleman in order, and he has no doubt the House will give unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to support the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the favorite declaration of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is that the Democrats talk economy and vote appropriations. He has been bewailing the fact that this House continually argues in favor of economy and votes for authorizations of appropriations. This time the situation is a little different. Here is an express declaration by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of this service, hardly dry on the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, that the department would not ask for an authorization of these vessels until the revenues justify the expenditure; yet the gentleman from Illinois is attempting to coerce the House into making an authorization that the department does not ask at this time. The Treasury statement of February 28 shows that the deficit for the present year up to that time is $24,604,000.

The gentleman from Illinois speaks of the condition of these vessels as if there were some danger to the service because new vessels would not be authorized. These old vessels of which he speaks are wooden vessels and the hulls will last an indefinite time. If the machinery be not in good condition the service is given ample money to keep it in good condition. Of course the vessels are not the new modern, commodious cutters upon which life is so pleasant in pleasant weather and so comfortable in distressing weather. They are not so desirable for pleasure trips by Members who may be in a position to utilize the Revenue-Cutter Service during their spare time, but so far as Congress is informed the work of the Revenue-Cutter Service is not suffering because modern elegant steamers have not supplanted these older wooden vessels, which have been effectively doing the work required. I hope that the House will impress upon the gentleman from Illinois at this time the necessity for exercising more care in the recommendations that are made, and in taking some care in making authorizations for expenditures not essential to the service and not asked for by the department.

Of course it is a desirable thing for the committee charged with the duty of making authorization to do whatever may be possible to keep the most modern and handsome vessels in this service, but so far as the Congress is informed there is no real necessity for them just now.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the hearings disclose whether or not these vessels are suitable for their purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not as suitable as vessels built to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they seaworthy, I will ask the gentleman? Can they be used at sea without endangering life? That is what some of us would like to know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Captain Ross of the Revenue-Cutter Service made the statement that the service was efficient to-day.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did Captain Ross make that statement relating to vessels or relating to the personnel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. At first it was difficult to tell.

Mr. MANN. In the end it was not difficult to tell?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but the Secretary and himself both stated that in view of the conditions of the revenue the department would not ask for money for new vessels; and, secondly, I shall add if the vessels were in an unseaworthy condition and unfit for use, the department would ask for the vessels regardless of the condition of the Treasury. Now, the gentleman may have some information which indicates that somebody's life is in danger when sailing on these vessels, but nobody in official circles who has never been compelled to put in his time on these vessels at any time thinks there is any danger on them, except the danger that exists on any vessel that may happen to be out in a particularly severe storm. There is danger then, and there will be danger under those conditions to those who are upon the vessels to be authorized in this bill. It seems to me that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will assist the House at this time in making an example of him in the interest of economy there will be less trouble hereafter in keeping our expenditures down or in preventing unnecessary and unwarranted expenditure.

Mr. MANN. I will agree to make up all this money under the sundry civil bill when it comes in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall not attempt to hinder the gentleman as he is endeavoring to hinder me.

Mr. MANN. Hinder nothing. We work together.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, in all that has been said to impress on the House the necessity for economy I am in hearty accord, but in speaking in favor of this bill I wish to bring to the attention of this House the reasons which brought to the bill the unanimous consent of the committee.

The statement has been made that this is an unwarranted expenditure. Such is not the case. It is for the purpose of conducting in a more efficient and economical manner the work which the Treasury Department is now doing that these vessels are authorized. The four vessels, two of which it is proposed to replace, are obsolete, and their removal from service is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I will read from his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, as follows:

> It is recommended that the Woodbury, Forward, Perry, and Rush be replaced as soon as practicable by modern, able, well-equipped vessels. The cutters named are obsolete, have been under constant repairs for many years, and are not suitable, either as to hulls or machinery, for the work they are intended to perform. The Rush, which was the last of these vessels built, has done service on the Pacific coast and the waters of Alaska for twenty-four years, while the Woodbury is 45 years old.

This indicates the official position of the Treasury Department.

The use of a modern vessel is an economy. Any merchant line that should undertake to perform the services which these revenue cutters are performing would, as a matter of business, immediately lay up these old and obsolete vessels and provide new and economical ones in their places. The revenue vessels are expected to put out to sea in any weather to aid vessels in distress. These old boats can not render, in this respect, proper service when their assistance is most needed, nor can they be run economically or efficiently in their regular work. Would the Committee on Appropriations wait until the old vessels sank, perhaps carrying their crews with them, before it approved of providing new ones? It is to save the excessive cost of maintenance and to aid the efficiency of the service that your committee recommends the two vessels proposed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the motion to strike out the enacting clause will not prevail. The purpose of this bill, which we amended, was to place a new cutter upon the Florida coast, which has been long needed and for which three or four bills have heretofore been reported. There came six Senate bills to our committee. We recognized the great necessity for this one, and we wanted to report it, but we could not report all of them. So, after hearing the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service on the present needs of the service, we decided to amend the bill and report it for two cutters, hoping that they would be completed in time to take the place of unseaworthy vessels, which must be retired. The report is unanimous; there is no doubt of the necessity for the two new cutters.

When we come to apply considerations as to the state of the revenues in the Treasury, there is a wide field for difference in judgment and taste as to what may be necessaries and what may be matters of ornament or luxury. I admire gentlemen on the other side when they occasionally and spasmodically talk about economy, but they are not accustomed to economy and do not know how to talk it nor apply it. When the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] commences to talk about economy, I hope he will not begin by cutting off what our people need while furnishing what his own people want. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Secretary of the Treasury have several times recommended the cutter for Key West. There is no cutter at that station for service on the Gulf and South Atlantic from Mobile, Ala., around to Savannah, Ga., many hundreds of miles. Other stations also needed cutters. In order to make two new cutters serve the purposes intended by the six that were proposed, we are simply changing the rule by this bill, so that this new cutter need not be confined to the Key West station, nor any other cutter to any particular station; but that the Secretary of the Treasury may utilize all cutters and get along with a smaller number by transferring them from station to station, as exigencies of the service may suggest, and utilizing them as far as necessary, so as to economize both in the number of cutters and the amount of money necessary to be appropriated.

These two cutters ought to be built; and the vigilant Committee on Appropriations ought to find some other item, that is not so necessary, to use the knife upon to help to prevent the deficit apparently inevitable no matter how many of these necessaries are cut off. We must not try to deceive the country nor ourselves by cutting off small and necessary appropriations, while making others not so useful nor necessary but requiring many millions more of money.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, this Government is never too poor to take care of the lives of its people. It never was so short of money that it could not afford to provide every safety that will insure the lives of its own people. But, Mr. Speaker, the important question is whether these vessels which it is proposed to put out of service are seaworthy, or will they, if used, endanger the lives of the people who are compelled to use them. For myself, I care not what gentlemen may say about a disposition to economy. I have throughout this session of Congress endeavored to be consistent. Some of my brethren seem to have forgotten their own speeches. What I would like to know, if I can learn from any gentleman informed upon the subject, is whether or not there is an actual necessity to furnish these vessels at this time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly; because I know the gentleman is informed.

Mr. MANN. If these vessels put to sea to perform the service the law requires, they would sink to the bottom of the sea. If they hang around the coast in good weather, they can board vessels, so far as that service is concerned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Just for information——

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will let me get through with this friendly controversy with the gentleman from Illinois, I will yield to him. Referring to the statement made by Captain Ross, was it as to the efficiency of the service? I could not understand from anyone because of the confusion about me. Does he refer to the personnel or to the vessels employed?

Mr. MANN. He refers to the personnel.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I call attention to the fact that some of these vesels they propose to put out of business are 45 years old.

Mr. BUTLER. That may be true, and I presume that they are not quite as seaworthy as they were forty-five years ago; but inasmuch as we have all pledged ourselves to be economical during this present term of Congress, I am in favor of searching for the light, so that I may be consistent. If I am convinced that the lives of our people will be more secure by authorizing these ships, I am ready to vote for the bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I always do so with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. We have three revenue cutters on the Gulf of Mexico, but not one of them can safely go to sea in stress of weather.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it necessary, I will ask my friend, that these ships should go to sea?

Mr. MANN. They should go to sea, by all means.

Mr. BUTLER. How are those duties performed now?

Mr. MANN. They have not been properly performed for the last few years, and are not now properly performed.

Mr. BUTLER. That is all; I do not wish more time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be considerable conflict as to what the facts show. The testimony that was given before the Committee on Appropriations was printed and is available to any Member of the House. The testimony given before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was not printed, and so I for one am not able to state what the officers of this service testified to before that committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The testimony has not been available to Members of the House, because I have sent out for a copy and have not been able to obtain it.

Mr. MANN. You can never obtain copies of hearings that are printed simply for the use of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, it is true that the hearings have not been published generally, but they have been published for examination, and the testimony at the hearings has been read on this floor. So if the gentleman had listened, he could have known what the testimony was.

Mr. STAFFORD. A copy of the testimony for use of committee members has been handed to me.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is what I want to call to the attention of the House: We passed a law here last year making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to give us information as to receipts and expenditures, and to have all estimates come through his department, the idea being that we would have some one connected with the administration who would be responsible for expenditures. Every time a proposition comes up, we are told that while we are in favor of economy, this particular proposition is an exception, and that we ought to appropriate the money; and so it goes on from year to year. Now I say to you that a proposition that was not strong enough to have the Secretary of the Treasury officially give his seal of approval to it is not strong enough for this House to pass; and I say to you, gentlemen, that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury said, of record here, that the Secretary of the Treasury had not determined that the condition of the Treasury was such as to warrant this expenditure.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. PETERS. Is the gentleman aware that the Secretary of the Treasury has made a report specifically asking for the retirement of four of these vessels?

Mr. SHERLEY. Even if he had, it would not demonstrate anything. The gentleman assumes that if those four vessels are retired the work is going to cease. What is the fact about the Revenue-Cutter Service? It was originally created for the purpose of protecting the revenues of the country, as its name implies; but it has branched out from that into other fields of activity, such as the going to the rescue of vessels in distress and the removing of derelicts from the high seas, and similar matters. You can give the service 20 more vessels, and they can employ them in scouring the high seas to succor any vessel that may need it, or to find if there is any vessel that does need it, and it is a question of how far you are going to expand the service. You have the statement of Captain Ross that his service is efficient. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] undertook to qualify that by saying that his statement simply referred to the personnel. The statement was also made that they were performing satisfactorily the duties imposed upon them. Now, I do not know what they have said before that committee, and I have no way of knowing, but I do know that after this bill was reported they came before our committee, and the captain of the service and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury declined to take the reponsibility of saying, considering the condition of the public funds, that this expenditure ought to be made. If they are not willing to take the responsibility, I am not. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will be recognized for five minutes, if there be no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. There seems to be a conflict of opinion as to just what was testified to before the Appropriations Committee as to the efficiency of this service. Through the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] I have an advance copy of the hearings, from which I wish to read, to settle, if possible, this controverted question.

At the opening of the hearing the chairman made this inquiry of Captain Ross, the head of the Revenue-Cutter Service:

Is your service efficient in meeting the requirements of that service at the present time?

Captain Ross. No; we have vessels that are not efficient that we are running yet.

Mr. MANN. Read that to the gentleman from Kentucky. He did not hear it in the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, if the gentleman will continue reading and give the House the whole testimony, he will find that my statement was correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I will continue to read where the chairman of the Appropriations Committee left off. If he had continued to read the very next sentence, he would have enlightened the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Read it all.

Mr. STAFFORD. He would have enlightened the House and showed that the vessels were not efficient, but that the personnel of the service was. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota left off reading this last answer by Mr. Norton, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

There is somewhat of a contradiction. The captain said that the service is entirely efficient, but not all of the vessels are entirely adapted to the work they are called on to do.

That was the last testimony that the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] read. If he had turned over the page and read the next sentence he would have shown to the House that there was no dispute whatsoever. We have Captain Ross following with this statement:

As I understood the chairman, he asked about the personnel of the service. We have ships in our service that are really of small efficiency and value.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody denies that.

Mr. STAFFORD. It shows that Captain Ross wished the committee to understand that whereas the personnel of the service was efficient, so far as these ships were concerned they were not, and no one can contend for a minute that ships that have been in the service for forty-five years—old wooden hulks, that are obliged to go out on the stormy seas of the gulf—are efficient for that character of service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman say to this question and answer, on page 129—

Well, the vessels may not be, but I am talking now about the service generally. Is it efficient in meeting the requirements of the service—not the vessels, but the service?

Captain Ross. I think so; some of our vessels, you know, are old.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not controvert the position of Captain Ross.

Mr. SHERLEY. It explains it.

Mr. STAFFORD. He says, "I am not talking about the efficiency of the vessel, but of the service." No one questions but that the personnel of the service is the very best. Those who have listened to the debates here and the explanations made by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that these two new vessels are urgently needed to replace the old hulks that have been in the service forty-five years. I am not surprised that gentlemen coming from the interior of the country, who do not know about the needs of the service, should be so strenuous in opposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where does the gentleman live?

Mr. STAFFORD. I live upon the shores of Lake Michigan, where we have the severest storms that there are upon the Lakes, and where I know the character of vessels needed for the service. The Tuscarora is one of those vessels, and they need to be very seaworthy to weather the storms. I do not live on the Ohio or the Mississippi.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman state how many of these boats have been in the service forty-five years? I understood the gentleman to say a number.

Mr. STAFFORD. One of these vessels has been forty-five years in the service, and another about thirty years, and so on; and the gentleman, who has a good deal of maritime knowledge, knows, as he comes from Lake Michigan, that old wooden hulks of thirty years or more are becoming obsolete and no longer useful to the service, and that they are being replaced with steel vessels. In this service it is necessary to have the very best, so as to secure the men in the service against the dangers of the sea.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this recommendation for two cutters based on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is based upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, wherein he stated that there was need for four additional vessels, and the testimony of Captain Ross before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in which he said that there was urgent need for two new vessels, to take the place of the four old hulks that can not perform the service efficiently to-day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to have the gentleman explain why, if the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was of such weight that the committee should recommend four new vessels as essential to the service, the committee thought the opinion of the Secretary of such little importance that they only recommended two vessels.

Mr. MANN. Out of regard for the Committee on Appropriations. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. We thought two were sufficient at the present time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is one vessel in the harbor of New York 37 years old which has not been mentioned and is still doing duty.

Mr. MANN. But it does not ever go to sea.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can understand the opposition of gentlemen who have no knowledge of seafaring conditions and whose objections are based on the ground of economy. That may explain the opposition of those on the other side, because it is a part of their creed at the present time to preach economy. But last week when we were considering a river and harbor act which appropriated large sums of money for the improvement of the upper Mississippi from St. Paul to St. Louis and below, and for improvement of the Ohio and the Missouri, we did not hear the siren voices of these gentlemen raised in opposition, but when we have a proposition——

Mr. FITZGERALD. We did not hear any opposition from the gentleman from Wisconsin either.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). But when we have a proposition to protect the lives of American seamen they spring forth with the cry of economy. That is not economy at all; it is false economy, because the modern ships, such as these are supposed to be, equipped in the most efficient way, will be able to perform twice the patrol duty that is now performed by these old wooden hulks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman if the new vessels are so much more efficient why does the committee provide for two new vessels and the retirement of one?

Mr. STAFFORD. In this bill we provide that both shall be retired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman familiar with the phraseology of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am familiar with the bill, and the gentleman will find that both of the old ones are to be retired. I have read that over closely and I believe that phraseology bears that construction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Read it; read it to the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read it this morning. It was the intendment of the committee to provide for the abandonment of these old wooden hulks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman read what his committee has reported?

Mr. STAFFORD. And I believe if the gentleman will give as much consideration to it as the members of the Commerce Committee have he will come to the same conclusion as to the abandonment of these vessels when the new vessels are put in the service.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes, in the absence of objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in reference to the Members of this House who are opposed to this proposition coming from the interior part of the country, I wish to say for his information that with the Revenue-Cutter Service and its officers and the necessity for it I am perhaps as well informed as the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has one of these revenue-cutter boats stationed on Lake Michigan at the city of Milwaukee. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the origin and purpose of this service was to aid in protecting the public revenues. Since that time this service has been extended. The activities of the Treasury Department through the Revenue-Cutter Service have been extended to the protection of the shipping interest on sea, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and I want to call attention also to the fact that no government on earth has a service of this kind as efficient as the service which we have to-day, and for that statement I have the authority of Captain Ross, the head of this service himself. I read from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. The service outside of the protection of the revenues—and that was the reason for the origin of the service, was it not?

Captain ROSS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the service has since its origin been extended to the protection of the marine service, has it not?

Captain ROSS. Yes. The duties of our service have expanded very considerably; protecting the revenue is now probably the least, or one of the least, features of our service, although if you take the revenue cutters away you will probably find vessels smuggling cargoes in bulk.

Mr. Speaker, the Revenue-Cutter Service is a police service as originally created. Since that time the service has been extended and now includes protection to vessels of all kinds sailing under any flag, and the removing of derelicts. We have extended that service until to-day in extent and efficiency it is superior to any similar service in any other country on the globe. If we desire, we may increase the number of vessels or still further expand this service for that purpose to any extent and increase the number of vessels, and as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has well said, and engage those vessels in scouring the sea for the purpose of finding derelicts or vessels in distress. There is no limit to the extent to which this branch of the Revenue-Cutter Service may be extended. The service to-day with the present equipment is an efficient service, and is performing the duty for which that service was originally created. Now, then, that being the case, and the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to the construction of these two vessels being a conditional recommendation, not an absolute recommendation, we are not justified in authorizing these vessels. If the service is in need of these vessels to the extent that gentlemen here contend, does any one suppose for one minute that the Secretary of the Treasury would not have absolutely recommended their construction instead of making a conditional recommendation?

Mr. McMORRAN. Has the gentleman any data that will give us the facts of whether the Government is sustaining any loss of revenue by the nonuse of the revenue cutters? Is the Government to-day losing any revenue through the insufficiency or the unseaworthiness of these revenue cutters?

Mr. TAWNEY. None whatever. I will say that these revenue cutters which it is proposed to retire, are used to-day in the protection of the revenues. They are used for police purposes, and there is no one who claims that their use will not be just as efficient next year as it is now or as it has been for the last ten years.

Mr. McMORRAN. Then what is the necessity for these revenue cutters in protecting the revenue of the Government going out to sea?

Mr. BUTLER. That is the question I want to ask.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no protection, so far as the revenue is concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any loss of revenue because they do not go out to sea?

Mr. TAWNEY. None whatever. They police the ports.

Mr. McMORRAN. Has the gentleman any information that demonstrates whether these cutters were ever seaworthy?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and they are now.

Mr. McMORRAN. Then, why should we want new ones?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what the Secretary of the Treasury says.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman referred to the very large expansion of work of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that that expansion is exceedingly valuable to the people of the United States and a most important thing to them?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not questioning the benefit of this service to the shipping interest; but, Mr. Speaker, this Revenue-Cutter Service, outside of the protection of the revenues, is limited to the coastwise vessels in the coastwise trade. We have no merchant marine to protect, as other countries have.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But is not that where the danger comes from?

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me read what Captain Ross said about it:

The CHAIRMAN. What foreign countries are there, if any, that maintain a service similar to the Revenue-Cutter Service in this country for purely police purposes?

Captain ROSS. Our duties extend considerably beyond the police feature.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that; but is there any country, any foreign country, that maintains a service similar to this?

Captain ROSS. I am not sure about that—whether all foreign countries have a revenue-cutter service, so-called—but I do not think that any revenue-cutter service is as efficient or as well maintained or is charged with as many duties as our Revenue-Cutter Service.

Now, in the light of that testimony, in view of the conditional recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury for these two additional vessels, and the condition of our revenues, I submit that this House is not justified in authorizing the expenditure of $500,000 for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say how much money was consumed in the last fiscal year in repairs to revenue cutters?

Mr. TAWNEY. The statement submitted for the next fiscal year, which is based upon the expenditures of this year——

Mr. MANN. But I would like information as to the last fiscal year. Has the gentleman that?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have it, if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. MANN. That is what I asked for.

Mr. TAWNEY. There was $75,000 appropriated for extraordinary repairs——

Mr. MANN. For this fiscal year?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am talking about this fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the last fiscal year. Has the gentleman that information?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; the last fiscal year, 1909. There was $75,000 for extraordinary repairs and about $120,000 for general repairs.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say how much money was expended by the Government on the repair of revenue cutters in the last fiscal year or any other fiscal year in the memory of the gentleman?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I have the statement right here.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Oh, if the gentleman has not the information, I will——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Captain Ross stated in his testimony that for the fiscal year 1909 they had expended about $120,000——

Mr. TAWNEY. And $75,000 on extraordinary expenditures.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And an additional expenditure of seventy-four thousand and some odd dollars out of an appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will give the gentleman from Illinois that information:

Captain ROSS. We spent for repairs in 1909 approximately $120,000, and also about $75,000. Under the present method we may spend more or less of any item and at the end of the year, if we have a surplus, we can apply it in necessary repairs or to something else if the service is in need. The special fund, if you propose to take it out, should be added to the lump sum of $2,388,000.

That answers the gentleman's question, I hope, to his satisfaction.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, without objection, is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, it ought to be presumed that I would know something about this subject, as I was born and reared on the banks of the Mad River, a tributary to the Miami River, a stream that was ambitious to engage in the flatboat trade in early times; but to be serious, Mr. Speaker, this question is somewhat confused here, I think, by the fact that revenue vessels that are sought to be constructed are used for a double purpose.

Originally they were simply police vessels to watch and aid in collection of the revenue. I think that the vessel which the distinguished gentleman from New York talks about as being now 37 years old, is in New York Harbor, and never goes outside of it, as I understand. There is no occasion for its being retired so long as it can float in the harbor. It is only used as a police ship. It is not sent abroad on the high seas to look out for the safety of vessels in distress and needing assistance. I remember when it was regarded as the principal duty of revenue cutters to go to sea and look out for and aid ships in trouble, especially from certain ports, stations, or harbors.

A very old captain in the Revenue-Cutter Service, one of the best that we ever had, and one of the most daring, was a few years ago removed from his ship, then in the port of Erie, Pa., and ordered down here to report to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I went with him to see the Assistant Secretary. The captain then found out that he was removed from the vessel that he had commanded so long because he had been reported as having gone out into the lake in times of storm for the purpose of protecting and saving vessels that were in danger. It was charged that in that way he had risked the loss of his ship and the lives of some young officers on board of it. I remember with what indignation the captain pulled out of his pocket an order of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, read it to him, and said:

My order is to go out into the lake in times of storm and danger, and I have obeyed, and I beg you now, as you have relieved me, to send me back, and, if you want to do so, issue an order that I am always to hunt a haven of safety when there is any possible danger abroad.

The Assistant Secretary then said:

There is a mistake about this. You were doing your duty.

He sent him back to perform that duty, to look out for ships of all kinds in times of danger.

Some of these revenue-cutter vessels, let me add and conclude, are used principally for the purpose of going to sea and looking out for vessels in distress, and a large number of other like vessels never go to sea, but are only used to perform the original duty of police vessels in harbors. They may grow old in service in doing the latter, whereas they would be wholly and totally unfit to go to sea to perform the more important duty of protecting vessels that are found to be in distress.

The fact that some of our revenue cutters are old and unseaworthy for the more dangerous service is no objection to them for mere police service in closed harbors.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes, at the end of which time I will ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest which my good friends, the members of the Committee on Appropriations, take in this matter. I appreciate also the fact that after this bill was reported into the House the distinguished committee took the opportunity of cross-examining gentlemen in favor of the passage of this bill, in the effort to make them say they were opposed to it. But I would like to make the amicable suggestion to the distinguished members of that committee that if they will attend more closely to the duties of their committee they will render a greater service to this House than they will in this respect.

Mr. SHERLEY. That comes with peculiar grace from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It comes with grace from any Member of the House to advise the members of the Committee on Appropriations, who are always seeking to advise everybody else. In the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year the item for revenue cutters is carried in a total sum of $2,488,000. If any other committee of this House reported an item like that in a lump sum, and not segregated, my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] would be batting the air here, telling the committee how the appropriation ought to be segregated into various items. He may spend profitably a portion of his time in the Committee on Appropriations. He might spend profitably a portion of the time he has wasted on this bill discovering a method of segregating the items under the Revenue-Cutter Service by which he could save to this Government a hundred thousand dollars or more a year. There are $2,488,000 in one item, covering repairs of vessels.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. No one knows what the repairs of the revenue cutters have cost. Those items which are charged to repairs amount to $120,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to my friend.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the segregation suggested by the gentleman from Illinois was prepared by the Committee on Appropriations and reported to the House, would he not take every item out of that segregation under a point of order on the ground that his committee has not prepared and reported the legislation making these appropriations in order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would not make the point of order for two reasons: First, the point of order would not lie, and I know enough about parliamentary procedure to know it. Second, I never made a point of order on any proposition which tended to segregate items. The gentleman always talks about other committees segregating the items, and the duties of other committees. Let him divide up the appropriation for the Revenue-Cutter Service and say how much shall be expended for repairs, and he will be the first man in favor of providing a new cutter instead of spending the same amount of money endeavoring to repair an old cutter that would be worthless when repaired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 61.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 144, answered "present" 9, not voting 101, as follows:

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I voted "nay" on the roll call. I have a pair with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and I withdraw my vote.

The name of Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi was called, and he answered "present."

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether or not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. JAMES. I voted "yea." I desire to change that vote to "present," as I have a general pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The name of Mr. JAMES was called, and he answered "present."

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman bring himself within the rule?

Mr. STANLEY. I would like to vote; but I am afraid I can not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present when his name should have been called and did not hear it?

Mr. CLINE. I was out part of the time, and came in after my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. FOELKER. How am I recorded, Mr. Speaker? I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman bring himself within the rule?

Mr. FOELKER. I think so.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present when his name was called and did not hear it?

Mr. FOELKER. I was present, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. But was the gentleman giving attention? The gentleman knows the rule. [After a pause.] The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Until the Chair hears the amendment the Chair can not pass upon it. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2 add a new section to be known as "section 3," to read as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to have the vessels provided for herein constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia,' approved August 1, 1892."

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order simply on the ground that the amendment is not germane to the bill or the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not the act to which the gentleman from New Jersey referred. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The title of the act is set out in the amendment, and it is the act of 1892, commonly known as the "eight-hour law." When it was passed in this House, according to the debates here, it was supposed to include all such public works of the United States as these very vessels. It was supposed to include public buildings and everything in the nature of a public work constructed on behalf of the United States under any contract, by any contractor or subcontractor; but now, by reason of departmental decisions, the scope of that act has been narrowed more and more each year. There has been introduced in this House a bill attempting to cure the defects said to exist in the present law as found by the heads of departments, but my experience teaches me to despair of ever getting a hearing for that bill on the floor. Now, so far as the germaneness of this particular amendment is concerned, all I have to say is that it simply limits the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury when he undertakes to have these vessels built and compels him to have them built under an eight-hour day. In my opinion, whatever may be the result as to the merits, the amendment is certainly germane.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I do not care to be heard further, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the amendment to be germane.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in support of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as I stated in discussing the point of order, the object of this amendment is simply to extend the provisions of the eight-hour legislation to public works of this character. It was not until some time after the act of 1892 was passed by this body that it was ever dreamed by anyone that a public work of this character could be constructed outside of the provisions of that legislation. The passage of this eight-hour law was heralded from one end of the country to the other as the result of the efforts of that distinguished citizen of Ohio, the lamented William McKinley, and nothing in his history and nothing in his legislative career aided more materially in his success in the State of Ohio after his defeat for Congress than the fact that he was the author of this eight-hour legislation. Being nominated for governor he carried the State of Ohio upon that platform by more than 40,000 majority. He said in the debates upon this bill that this legislation had long been promised by his party, that makeshift legislation was then upon the books, that they had spoken the word of promise to the ear and broken it to the hope of the laboring men of this country long enough, and he asked his party and asked this House to pass this legislation, which they did practically without a dissenting voice.

The legislation went upon the books, and from that time to this there has been a constant fight against the legislation by the heads of the different departments. All sorts of claims have been resorted to in order to nullify its provisions. It has been held that the law does apply to a public work, but the departmental heads have held that in the case of the erection of a building the men who were putting stone upon stone came within the provisions of the act, but that a mechanic who dressed the stone upon an adjoining vacant lot did not come within the provisions of the law.

In many other respects the departments have vied with each other in their efforts to render nugatory the legislation, and yet the Republican party claims in every campaign that it is responsible for this legislation. There has been introduced in every Congress since I have been here an eight-hour bill; there have been hearings had on that bill, but there is no hope—I think I can say without violating any committee confidence, in view of the remarkable circumstance that happened in the Committee on Labor—that, in my judgment, there is no hope of that legislation being reported upon the floor of this House, where no power on earth could prevent its passage.

Now, there is only one way, if we really want the legislation, in which we can get at this matter, and that is, whenever the rules will permit us, to legislate so that the work must be done under the eight-hour law. I have time and time again attempted to apply the provisions of this law by amendment to appropriation bills, the naval and other bills, and I have had the remarkable experience once of having my amendment declared in order one year and then out of order the following year. [Laughter.]

There is no question of order involved in this case; it is a flat-footed proposition to say to the Secretary of the Treasury that we authorize him to have the ships constructed; that we vote the money for the construction of these ships under conditions of labor that are humane and that have the sanction and approval not only of the House, but the people of the entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the amendment has been offered. It is perfectly plain that if the Government constructs these vessels they will be constructed under the eight-hour law. It is equally plain that if they should be constructed under contract there probably is no shipyard in the country where they would be constructed at a reasonable cost, if we should require the yards and all the manufacturers of material that go into the vessels to operate under the eight-hour law. I think it would practically prohibit the construction of these vessels at any place except by the Government itself.

The Revenue-Cutter Service is not equipped with shipyards for the construction of vessels. It is possible that these vessels might be constructed in one of the navy-yards. It does not seem advisable to tie up the hands of the Government in this way, where it would have no effect upon the establishment of the eight-hour law as a general proposition, and would only embarrass the Government in its construction work, if the construction work is by contract, and increase greatly the cost, not merely the cost of the difference between the eight and ten hours of labor, but the cost in the shipyards that are not prepared now to construct with eight-hour labor or to furnish materials obtained from eight-hour establishments exclusively. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. I have been amazed at the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that no private shipyards in this country can as now organized construct ships under the system of eight hours for a day's work. He says, in effect, that the shipyards in the United States, favored as they are by the laws of the United States in the construction of ships, given a monopoly of the construction of ships flying the American flag, whether used in international or in the coastwise trade—that none of the shipyards, favored as they are by the laws of Congress, are prepared to give to their laborers any of the benefits contemplated by the eight-hour law of the United States and the widespread eight-hour practice. [Applause.]

It is a sad commentary on the shipyards which are subsidized by law and given a profitable monopoly, that it is now impossible, if it is, for the United States to have any of its vessels constructed under the eight-hour law passed by Congress and the eight-hour practice which has become universal in well conducted private enterprises. I think, Mr. Speaker, if there are no private shipyards in the United States to-day able to construct vessels under the eight-hour law and under the eight-hour practice, it is time that Congress withdrew from those shipyards the highly protective laws of the country which give them a monopoly in building American ships and which have been enacted for their benefit. [Applause.]

It is certainly not contemplated by the shipping laws of the United States which give these private yards a monopoly in the construction of American ships that the monopoly is given to them wholly for the benefit of capitalists who build the ships. This monopoly is given them, as has been pretended, at least in part, for the benefit of labor of the United States; and American labor has been committed for many years with the indorsement of Congress and the approval of the great public to the eight-hour practice. [Applause.]

It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois in his declaration that no shipyard in the United States is prepared to build ships under the eight-hour law has made a very damaging confession, if it be true, and has presented an argument why Congress should adopt the eight-hour amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey may be agreed to. I see no reason why the Government of the United States should provide for eight hours a day in every department and on every work in which it engages and permit those with whom it contracts for similar work to that which it does itself to employ labor at longer hours. I sincerely hope, therefore, that this amendment may be agreed to. [Applause.] If eight hours a day is proper, and it is in the United States upon work in which we engage, it is proper for those with whom we contract to do work for us. There is no reason why we should place ourselves upon one standard and those that work for us on another. I shall vote for the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I hope the amendment will prevail. For eight years, almost, I have been a Member of this House, and this is the first time the membership of this body has had an opportunity to go on record either in favor of an eight-hour proposition as applied to government work, or against it. For years I have seen representatives of the shipbuilding industry in this country appear before the Committee on Labor and by long-continued hearings make it impossible to report out the eight-hour bill. I have seen it reported out in a former Congress, and I have seen it die on the calendar of this House. I have seen it referred by the Labor Committee to a committee of lawyers to report as to its constitutionality, and I have seen it killed in that way. At the present time it is referred to a subcommittee that never meets.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Did that subcommittee appointed to examine as to the constitutionality of the bill ever hold any meetings?

Mr. RAINEY. They never had a meeting.

Mr. NICHOLLS. And never made a report.

Mr. RAINEY. Never made a report, and the subcommittee to which the bill is now referred has never had a meeting; but I believe the chairman of that subcommittee, until a very recent date, has been in the State of Florida. For two or three years the force employed in our government arsenals has been gradually diminishing. For two or three years the government contracts have been going in larger and larger amounts to the Bethlehem Steel Works and to Midvale. At the present time in the works of the Bethlehem Steel Company 10,000 men are idle, and the strike commenced there in the shops devoted to government work.

The strike commenced there and is carried on there among unorganized laborers. That strike is unique—labor unions had nothing to do with it. The poorest-paid skilled laborers in the country are employed in the works of the Bethlehem Steel Company. They make the guns for the army; they make the guns for the navy. They make armor plate used in the navy. They claim they make guns up here at Watervliet, but they do not do it. The orders for all the castings and all the forgings of all the guns for the army and practically all of the guns for the navy are diverted by the officers in charge to Midvale and Bethlehem, and there the castings and the forgings are made by the poorest-paid skilled labor in all the world.

Mr. CARY. Is it not a fact that those guns are sent back here to the navy-yard to be finished up?

Mr. RAINEY. After the castings and the forgings are finished up at Bethlehem—and that is the principal part of the work, 80 per cent of it, anyway—they are simply sent to the government yards, and they are assembled there.

The work of making the guns in government arsenals now is simply a process of assembling the parts, and yet they claim they make them there, and they simply assemble and polish and rifle the guns after they are made. They ought to make the guns complete in the government plants. A public scandal is now brewing in this country on account of the operations of these private works, which employ the cheapest skilled labor in the country. Not long ago, I am informed, although the press agencies do not mention it, a great 14-inch gun burst in its trials over here somewhere near Sandy Hook. It was manufactured and forged and the castings made by one of these private companies. Nothing was said about it, and nothing is said as to the amount the Government has lost by the bursting of one of the greatest guns ever manufactured in this country. No one knows that.

The position taken by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is not tenable for a moment. He says if these ships can be manufactured in the government yards, then we do not need the eight-hour law, as the existing law already provides for that. If they are built in government yards, then this amendment, I submit, can do no harm, but we know enough already about the methods of letting contracts of this kind to know that these ships will not be built in the government yards unless, perhaps, this amendment prevails. Parts of them will be sublet to Bethlehem if they ever get their 10,000 workmen back there again. No man knows how much the United States is losing at the present time on account of the strike at Bethlehem. Not long ago, on account of the failure of the Government to furnish in time to the Cramp Shipbuilding Company armor plate and other apparatus which was manufactured by some of these private companies, the Cramp & Sons Company sustained a loss. They brought suit against this Government, and a judgment has just been rendered against the Government in the courts for $42,000 and more. These are little revenue cutters. Is it possible that we can not build them in our government yards? Over in Japan they are building great Dreadnoughts in their government yards.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. If these ships are to be built in the private yards, and they may be, then I submit that the time has come in this country, in this small particular, at least, to establish an eight-hour day in our shipyards. They are doing it in Germany. Over there they have established almost a universal eight-hour day, working men in three shifts in their factories, keeping factories that cost millions of dollars in use for all of the twenty-four hours in the day, thus saving immense sums of money in interest on investments. As a result of all this enterprise our real competitor now in the markets of the world, especially for the heavier machinery and structural iron, is not England, but Germany, where they have established practically an eight-hour day.

I congratulate the House upon this opportunity, and I want to assure the gentlemen on both sides of this House that upon this question, if you attempt to vote down this amendment, there will be a roll call, so that every man can go back to his constituents with a record upon this the most important industrial question at the present time before the people.

Mr. FASSETT. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask him if he wants to leave in the RECORD his statement that the wages paid at Bethlehem are the lowest wages in the world in any particular kind of employment?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not say in the world; I said in this country for skilled laborers.

Mr. FASSETT. Then gentlemen on this side of the House misunderstood the gentleman, because we understood him to say in reference to two or three classes of labor that they were the lowest paid at Bethlehem of any skilled labor in the world.

Mr. RAINEY. The statement I made—I do not want to be misunderstood——

Mr. FASSETT. That is the reason I asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. RAINEY (continuing). At Bethlehem they are not organized. You can not charge that strike against organized labor. Up there they are compelling men to work twelve and fourteen hours a day. They are compelling them to work on Sunday. Up there, three or four weeks ago, in one of the shops engaged in government work——

Mr. FASSETT. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. RAINEY (continuing). Where a committee of workmen was appointed to protest against working two hours overtime without time and a half pay, the usual wages for overtime, the committee were at once discharged by Charles M. Schwab as soon as they presented the case. In this way the strike at Bethlehem commenced, and to-day 10,000 men are out of work and government work there is thus being delayed. What I said was this: At Bethlehem, on account of the fact that they have crushed out the unions completely and on account of the further fact that they have an endless-chain arrangement by which they bring men from Ellis Island down there to work, and keep them away from the farms of the West, they have been able to establish the lowest scale of wages paid in the country to skilled laborers; they have been paying them the lowest wages paid anywhere in the United States, and that is the occasion for the strike; and the treasurer of the Republican national committee is one of the directors at Bethlehem.

Mr. FASSETT. The gentleman's answer is quite different from his statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will withhold his motion for a minute?

Mr. MANN. I will.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman make a formal amendment? Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman from Minnesota renews the pro forma amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the object of this bill is the authorization of two unnecessary revenue-cutter vessels and it is not——

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman discussed that a while ago.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And it is not a proposition of whether we are going to adopt or not adopt an eight-hour law, and I trust the Members of the House who are opposed to authorizing these vessels will, on the final vote, vote as they did before.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has not the House already decided the question as to whether these boats will be built or not——

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). By refusing to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not, except indirectly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is equivalent to refusing——

Mr. TAWNEY. The question is whether we will vote to pass this bill and authorize these two ships.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the gentleman to say bill and amendments?

The SPEAKER. The amendment is pending. The Chair was under the impression the amendment had been agreed to, but the previous question will cover both.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker: Which amendment? There is a committee amendment and the one I offered.

Mr. MANN. The committee amendment is already agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not sure. The Chair is informed the committee amendment has been agreed to, so the only vote is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The House then divided; and there were—ayes 118, noes 58.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide two new revenue cutters, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill and the three other bills from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were passed was laid on the table.

STEAMERS "A. B. WOLVIN" AND "CAMBRIA."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

When the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called,

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 5697.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5697) to authorize the change of name of the steamers A. B. Wolvin and Cambria, owned by the Port Huron and Duluth Steamship Company.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon application by the owner, the Port Huron and Duluth Steamship Company, of Port Huron, Mich., to change the names of the steamer A. B. Wolvin, official No. 107563, and the steamer Cambria, official No. 126420.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TONNAGE DUTIES ON VESSELS.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Union Calendar the bill S. 4639.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4639) concerning tonnage duties on vessels entering otherwise than by sea.

Be it enacted, etc., That vessels entering otherwise than by sea from a foreign port at which tonnage or light-house dues or other equivalent tax or taxes are not imposed on vessels of the United States shall be exempt from the tonnage duty of 2 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 10 cents per ton in any one year, prescribed by section 36 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. This bill being on the Union Calendar, under the rule the Chair declares the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4639.

Mr. GREENE. This bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. If anyone desires to occupy any time upon the bill I will yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GREENE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill simply refer to Canadian vessels?

Mr. GREENE. It refers to both Canadian vessels and American vessels.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I mean—that is, the commerce between the United States and Canada?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; on the Lakes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this confine it entirely to Canadian ships?

Mr. GREENE. The bill is confined to American ships and Canadian ships between the ports of the United States and Canada. It is a reciprocity measure between both American ports and Canadian ports. This had been in existence for twenty-five years, until the last tariff bill was passed, on the 5th of August.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it confined to vessels engaged in trade on the Great Lakes?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir. It does not take in seagoing vessels.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not seagoing vessels?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman explain what provision of the bill excludes vessels in the over-sea carrying trade, except those——

Mr. GREENE. It does not refer to the over-sea trade. It only refers to trade on the Lakes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not say "lake." It says, "By sea from a foreign port."

Mr. GREENE. "Otherwise than by sea." That is the usual expression in regard to the Lakes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understand this is to correct a provision that went into the last tariff act.

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. May I ask whether it has the approval of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. GREENE. I have not heard any objection to it. The bill has been on the calendar for about six weeks, and no objection to the bill has been brought to my attention.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not like to say anything in the absence of the gentleman from New York. I should think it would be lèse majesté for anybody to propose an amendment to the tariff bill.

Mr. GREENE. This bill has been passed by the Senate without objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman tell us what the bill will accomplish?

Mr. GREENE. It remits the tonnage tax between the United States and Canada on through trade on the Great Lakes, which is a convenience that was enjoyed previous to the passage of the last tariff act. There has been no tonnage tax levied on this class of trade since 1885.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It remits the tonnage tax on foreign vessels as well?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Applies to vessels of a foreign country on the tonnage tax?

Mr. GREENE. It would benefit American more than Canadian trade, because there are so many more American vessels engaged in trade on the Lakes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Is this another effort to doctor up the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot tariff bill?

Mr. GREENE. I have no desire to doctor that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not that what this bill does?

Mr. GREENE. It is to correct an error in that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That bill was got up in such a slovenly way that you have got to doctor it up by a bill from another committee.

Mr. GREENE. I do not know about that.

Mr. HARRISON. Why did not this bill, which affects the revenue, go to the committee to which recommendations are made about making a tariff?

Mr. GREENE. I am not able to answer the question. The bill came to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and that committee considered it, and it was unanimously reported.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman know that the sole reason alleged by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means why a bill was not allowed to postpone the filing of data for the corporation tax was for fear of amendments to the tariff law? Is that the reason why this bill did not go to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. GREENE. I do not know. This bill came directly, by proper reference, to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MANN. This bill is beyond the point of amendment in the Senate, is it not?

Mr. GREENE. Why, certainly. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 4639, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if this bill is open to amendment.

Mr. GREENE. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has not been read under the five-minute rule for amendment yet.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no knowledge of what took place in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union except by the report of the chairman of that committee to the House. The bill is reported back by the chairman with the recommendation that it do pass. Now, we are in the House, and the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, demands the previous question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can advise the Chair that it was not read; that there was no reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Well, that was not the report to the Chair. And the Chair has no knowledge, parliamentarily or in fact, except what the gentleman states. The Chair must rely upon the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the previous question.

Mr. GREENE. To the final passage?

The SPEAKER. To the final passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 128, noes 35.

So the previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York opposed to the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Merchant Marine, and on that demand the previous question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the rule provide that a motion to recommit with instructions shall take precedence over a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any such rule.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. Speaker, I stood upon my feet demanding the attention of the Chair——

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (continuing). And made several efforts to get the attention of the Chair, and the Chair studiously refused to give recognition.

The SPEAKER. So did the gentleman from New York. If the gentleman will indulge the Chair, the gentleman from New York was upon his feet asking recognition. Now it is a very simple matter. Somebody is entitled to recognition to move to recommit. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] were both upon their feet. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was recognized, and he was asked, when he made the motion, whether he was opposed to the bill. The reply was that he was opposed, and pursuant to the ordinary practice of all Speakers, both when the gentleman's party was in power and now when the present party is in power, the Chair elected to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But will the Speaker permit me to call his attention to the fact that at the time I was here demanding the attention of the Chair to make a motion which is in order, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was in private conversation at the desk with the Speaker, and he was not recognized until some time afterwards, when he came down upon the floor? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman barely asked the privilege of recognition, and before the gentleman was recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] also rose to his feet. The Chair, from his recollection and from the practice of the House in this and former Congresses, elects, under the rule, to recognize a gentleman on the majority side who is opposed to the bill in preference to recognizing a gentleman in the minority who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the practice of the House it has been the custom to recognize those in the minority opposed to the bill in preference to those in the majority; and I call the attention of the Speaker to his own action in recognizing the leader of the minority in preference to the gentleman from Minnesota when an attempt was made to move to recommit the tariff bill, when it was under discussion.

The SPEAKER. That was an occasion when there was a party question involved, and the Chair recognized the most conspicuous opponent, namely, the leader of the minority, if the Chair recollects the occasion referred to. Now, this is not a party question. There comes a conflict as to which of two should be recognized. The Chair recognizes the leader of the House on the majority side, who states that he is opposed to the bill, and who seems to be, from the standpoint of leadership, the most conspicuous gentleman who applied for recognition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, for a conspicuous gentleman opposed to a bill of this kind he remained remarkably silent while the bill was under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. On a question of recognition the Chair declines to entertain the appeal, in conformity with the precedents of the last forty years. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] demands the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 116, answered "present" 12, not voting 106, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recommit the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And upon that, Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. As many as are opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Forty-two gentlemen arose in favor of ordering the yeas and nays and 145 have voted against ordering the yeas and nays. A sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 160, answered "present" 14, not voting 95, as follows:

So the motion to recommit the bill was rejected.

The following additional pairs were announced:
For the session:
Mr. CURRIER with Mr. FINLEY.
Until further notice:
Mr. MADDEN with Mr. TALBOTT.
Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. SAUNDERS.
Mr. PRATT with Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana.
Mr. GRAFF with Mr. BELL of Georgia.
Mr. FOSS with Mr. BEALL of Texas.
Mr. LAFEAN with Mr. COVINGTON.
For the balance of the day:
Mr. KOPP with Mr. LATTA.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts has no further business from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the Clerk will continue the call of committees.

The Clerk continued the call of committees.

PURCHASE OF EMBASSY SITES ABROAD.

Mr. LOWDEN (when the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I call up the bill (H. R. 15814) providing for the purchase or erection of embassy, legation, and consular buildings abroad, which is upon the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15814, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15814, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire in foreign countries such sites and buildings as may be appropriated for by Congress for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States, and to alter, repair, and furnish the said buildings, suitable buildings for this purpose to be either purchased or erected, as to the Secretary of State may seem best, and all buildings so acquired for the diplomatic service shall be used both as the residences of diplomatic officers and for the offices of the diplomatic establishment: Provided, however, That not more than the sum of $1,000,000 shall be expended in any fiscal year under the authorization herein made: And provided further, That in submitting estimates of appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost for the acquisition of sites and buildings, and for the construction, alteration, repair, and furnishing of buildings at each place in which the expenditure is proposed, which limit of cost shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case, except by new and express authorization of Congress.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "one million" and insert the words "five hundred thousand."

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, many of the Members who are present will recall that this bill was up for consideration a little more than a year ago. There were many objections made to the form of the bill, but I think that generally the Members were in favor of the principle of the bill. In fact, some of those objections which we believe we have done in this bill which has just been read. The committee had given even then much time to the consideration of the bill, but I want to say to my younger friends here that they will have the profoundest lesson in humility, no matter how thoroughly they have studied their bill, when they bring it up for the first time in this House. I wish also to add that instead of justifying all of the provisions of that bill we reached the conclusion that by a careful study we would remedy the substantial defects pointed out, and I submit to the House that we have succeeded in this.

I shall not make an extended argument upon the bill, because I believe that the House is practically ready for a vote. I wish, however, to mention some of the general considerations and will content myself with that which moved the committee at this time to urge with all its ability that the bill be passed, and that the United States of America may take the first step which will lead to the establishment of a diplomatic profession in America. [Applause.]

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult for our ambassadors and ministers to find any sort of a place at all adequate to the needs of the Government for many months, and often more than a year, after they come to take possession of their new posts. What an embarrassment this must be to the diplomacy of the United States all may readily see. I think that many of you will recall the anecdote that went the rounds of the country at the time that Mr. Choate first went to the Court of St. James as ambassador from the United States. He was living at a hotel, and, so went the anecdote, he was out late at night, wandering about, when a policeman accosted him and asked him why he did not go home. He replied, "I have no home; I am the American ambassador." [Laughter and applause.]

Even more difficult than London is it in Berlin and Paris, Vienna and St. Petersburg to rent a house that is at all suitable for this purpose, with the result that just at the time when our representative ought to be able to establish himself on amicable terms with the officials of foreign governments, namely, during the first few months of his service, he is obliged to live somewhere in a hotel.

There is another reason that is equally important to my mind and which ought to be equally persuasive to this House, and that is that we all know that in our own private pursuits if we have an important negotiation to conduct, we frequently maneuver sometimes for weeks to have that negotiation conducted in a place and under the environment which is most agreeable and satisfactory to us. In this way we have a better opportunity of getting what is our due under those circumstances than otherwise. If that be true in our own private affairs, how much more must it be true of the ambassador of a great country who has difficult and delicate negotiations of state to conduct with the foreign government?

I might say in this connection that in every book of memoirs I have seen that has been written by an American diplomat, first and foremost have been pointed out not only the difficulties of negotiations under these circumstances, but in many cases how important negotiations have failed because of the superior facilities of other governments that were interested. But to my mind even more important than either of these is the fact, if we would do justice to our country, that we must so establish facilities for our diplomatic service that the poorest man may look to the highest rewards in diplomacy, provided only he has ability, experience, and industry. By successive executive orders our entire foreign service below the rank of ambassador and minister has been taken out of politics. We thus have the beginning of a profession of diplomacy. It ought to be possible for the lowest man in the foreign service to feel that it is within his power, if his service justifies it, to reach the highest posts. This is impossible under existing conditions. Rents are so high in foreign capitals that only the rich can afford to take the highest places. What would gentlemen think if our practice were such that only the very rich could become Presidents of the United States? What would gentlemen say of this democracy if our policy were such that no man could go upon the federal bench or come to Congress unless he were a millionaire?

And yet we are rapidly drifting into a state of affairs where the men best equipped in every other way have to decline these honorable and important commissions abroad. Gentlemen will recall that it is only a short time ago since this Government was humiliated by the episode which occurred at Berlin at the time an exchange of our ambassadors was made. But it has been suggested by some that to have embassies of our own would make it still more burdensome upon the poor man competent to discharge the duties of these offices. I have taken great pains since the last debate upon this bill to discuss with many of our foreign representatives whether or not this be a true charge. I even last autumn, happening to be in Paris, visited, in company with our then ambassador, Mr. White, the embassies of Great Britain, Germany, and Austria, which were regarded as being typical of the capitals of Europe. I found that in every instance one floor of the embassy, furnished by the Government, was simply used for state occasions and was closed during the balance of the year, the family of the ambassador living in comparative simplicity on the floors above.

I found that in the house which had been rented by Mr. White, our ambassador, the same practice obtained, and he assured me—and no one in our diplomatic service has had a larger experience than Mr. White—that this was his practice, and that the expenses of living, following that method, were no whit larger than even if our representatives were obliged to live in a less suitable place. An interesting incident that he told me at that time brings to my mind now the importance of having the embassy and the chancellery connected in the same building. That is not the situation with reference to our embassies, where the embassy may be off in one place and the chancellery or offices at another. The Government of the United States had ordered, when the late President Cleveland died, in order to do honor to his memory, that the flag above the embassy should be carried at half-mast. At our embassy at Paris it was attempted to carry out this order but our offices there were simply a suite of offices in a sort of an office building, and we had no more rights than the other tenants, and a real estate agent, who occupied one of the other suites, protested to the landlord. The ambassador of the United States, under the conditions, was obliged to remove our flag and failed for that reason to do honor to a great man whom this country had honored and whose memory will be one of our most priceless possessions as the years go by.

I submit that during the last twelve years, or since the Spanish-American war, according to the testimony of the Secretary of State before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the business of the State Department has more than doubled. In the years gone by it was not so important, but, whether we will or no, the fact remains that America has become a world power, that the ministers of state of every foreign country desire to cultivate our foreign representatives, and we must put them in a position where they can deal with the foreign countries on something like equal terms. [Applause.] This bill provides for no present appropriation. The reason for that was that the Treasury is not so full as we would wish it, and another reason quite as important was that we preferred to require in this bill, which is simply an authorization to commence upon this policy, that the Secretary of State in making any recommendations in the future with reference to this subject should accompany those recommendations with a detailed statement of what the expense would be after thorough consideration had been had, and that no appropriations in excess of that sum could be appropriated in the future, except by a new authorization. A further limitation was put in the bill, and that was that not more than half a million dollars should be expended in any one fiscal year.

The purpose of that was that we may begin in a businesslike way, possibly next winter, and I hope that the State Department will then have ascertained at which one of these places we have the greatest need and certify what an embassy can be purchased for at such place to enable us in a businesslike and economical way to make a start. There is one other thing of which I wish to remind you.

Beyond our own boundaries the only places which the United States of America may occupy as of right are our embassies, legations, and consulates. Within them the flag of America is as supreme as within the city of New York; elsewhere it floats only by the courtesy of foreign nations. Is it befitting the dignity of a great nation that the whim or the purse of him who for the time represents America abroad should determine whether this bit of American soil shall be here or there in the foreign capitals—one year in a flat and the very next year in a palace? Would it not be better, infinitely better, if the Nation should furnish our foreign representatives a permanent home, simple but adequate, in keeping with the best traditions of the Republic, where the hospitality exercised by them would put the nations of the world under obligations not to the persons of our ambassadors and ministers but to the United States? [Applause.]

We have boasted through all our history that this is a country of homes. Shall the Nation alone be homeless? Shall America's flag be a tramp in the capitals of the world, protecting not a Nation's home but only the temporary abiding place of America's representatives? Shall we arise to the Nation's needs, imposed upon her by the last dozen years of our history?

I would not say one word in criticism of the great body of the men who have represented us in foreign lands. Beginning with Benjamin Franklin and coming down to the present, they have served us faithfully and well. Now, let this Nation do its part. Let us either withdraw from the capitals of the earth, or let us enable our foreign representatives to serve their country abroad on something like equal terms with the rest of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOWDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman's proposition that we ought to pay the expenses of our own ministers. I would want to see the American ambassador or minister living abroad in a house that belonged to this country and in a manner which is in keeping with what the people of that community would expect from this country. But has the committee considered the other side of the proposition, whether there is not a practicable way to limit what seems to me to be a vulgar and ostentatious rivalry of the very rich set in foreign capitals? It seems to me we ought to go to neither extreme. We ought neither to be penurious nor unmindful of what is proper in those countries, nor does it seem to me that we ought to attempt to make displays which some of our ambassadors have attempted to make abroad. My question is, Has the committee considered whether there is any practicable way to do away with that side of the matter?

Mr. LOWDEN. The limitation is contained in this bill itself, I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia. Under the new form, for which I am indebted largely to some of the distinguished gentlemen who opposed the bill the last time, no appropriation is in order unless accompanying that is an estimate of the expenses which the Government will incur, and the further provision that nothing in subsequent Congresses will be appropriated under this authorization without a new law, that exceeds the limit so fixed in the statement which the Secretary of State has made.

Mr. MADDEN. And does the gentleman in charge of the bill think it possible under this bill to fix a limit for the cost of any one building at as much as is proposed to be appropriated in any one year?

Mr. LOWDEN. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill proposes that no amount in excess of $500,000 can be appropriated in any one year.

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the thought of the committee that all of the $500,000 may be spent in any one building?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes; in a few cases. And doubtless that much will have to be spent in some of the capitals of Europe where land is exceedingly high, and then we will have a simple American home, with nothing at all of the elegance which characterizes the embassies of many of the great nations of Europe.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think we ought to commit this Government to the expenditure of as much as $500,000 in the construction of any one building in any capital of any nation of the world?

Mr. LOWDEN. That question will more properly arise, I may say——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. LOWDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there any possibility under this bill of committing the Government to the expenditure of any sum of money for any embassy building unless it be hereafter authorized by Congress in an appropriation bill?

Mr. LOWDEN. Absolutely none.

Mr. MANN. Under an estimate of cost from the department making a limit of cost, so that when Congress shall make an appropriation for the embassy at any point it would know in advance the limit of cost at that place?

Mr. LOWDEN. Absolutely; and if any appropriation committee in some subsequent year would bring in a bill providing for additional cost, that provision would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, my friend remembers that I was one of those who saw fit to criticise the bill when it was up the last time, for what seemed to me to be a serious defect, inasmuch as it did not fix a limit of cost.

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In the phraseology of this new bill an attempt has been made to meet that objection. However, I should like to ask my friend whether he thinks that the phraseology really meets the objection? As it is, when we enter upon building legislation Congress reserves to itself the right to fix the limit of cost, while according to this bill the limit of cost would be practically fixed by the Secretary of State, and he would merely give notice to the House, or to Congress, of what he expects to expend for this or that purpose. I would, therefore, suggest, in order to meet that objection—and it will not interfere in any way with the carrying out of the object of this bill—to insert, in line 7, after the words "shall set forth," "subject to the approval of Congress, the limit of cost for acquiring site and building." That will be practically stating it for the information of the House, and that would be the practice anyway, because after the Secretary of State has submitted his estimates, and has fixed the limit of cost, that would have to be subject to the approval of the Committee on Appropriations when it makes the appropriation, this being only an authorization. Therefore no harm is done if you previously specify that the limit of cost shall be subject to the approval of Congress.

Mr. LOWDEN. I do not see how that is possible.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri? That proposition would immediately raise the question of legislation on an appropriation bill. If it required the approval of Congress, it would mean legislation, and the whole thing would be subject to a point of order. So that this would not advance the situation at all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Would not this bill, if it passed and became law, be authority to the Committee on Appropriations and bind it, and consequently it would be in accordance with existing law?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman puts in the bill a provision that the limit of cost fixed by the Department of State is subject to the approval of Congress, it would require the approval of Congress in a separate act. The approval of Congress can not be given in an appropriation bill, because the approval would be an act of legislation, which is subject to the point of order on an appropriation bill. As the bill now stands, the Secretary of State must make an estimate of the limit of cost of a building at a particular place. The estimate of limit of cost in any bill could not in any case be exceeded without the express authorization of Congress. But if the gentleman's proposition goes in, that the limit of cost in each case must be approved by Congress, it must be approved by an act of legislation, which can not be done on an appropriation bill over a point of order, and you would not get any further along than now.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I suppose the gentleman had caught the point that I have tried to make—that Congress should reserve to itself the right to fix the limit of cost. The theory of this bill is that it shall be given to the Secretary of State.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Congress can easily fix the limit of cost below the amount fixed by the Secretary of State by the limitation "That no part of the money shall be expended," and so forth; but Congress can not fix the limit of cost without legislation, and that can not be done on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is not intended, either.

Mr. MANN. That, in effect, can be done with the bill as it stands now, as well as it can be done under the suggested amendment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Well, I merely reserve to this House the right to say what it shall be.

Mr. MANN. But this House has the right to do that when it makes the appropriation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We would like to know what the gentlemen are conversing about. We are interested in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. LOWDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Believing that we ought to go into this thing with our eyes wide open, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois two or three questions. In the first place, how many of these embassies do you gentleman on the Foreign Affairs Committee, who have studied this question more than the rest of us, intend ultimately to build?

Mr. LOWDEN. I suppose that it is the belief of the committee, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, within the limitation contained in this bill, that this expenditure of half a million a year, year by year, would build at least one each year if the condition of the Treasury justified an appropriation. That would be my idea.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many would you proceed to build?

Mr. LOWDEN. We would proceed to build, if my views were adopted, until in every capital we owned our own embassy, or where we had a legation, owned our own legation.

Now, with reference to the consular offices, I do not believe that anyone on the committee, so far as I am advised, would favor our owning our own consulates in Europe, but only as we do in some instances now in the Orient, where it seems to be an absolute necessity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. About how much does the committee think an embassy building, if that is the proper diplomatic language——

Mr. LOWDEN. The gentleman is always proper.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much would it cost in a city like Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, or London?

Mr. LOWDEN. I am not prepared to say, beyond this, that under this bill the limit could not be to exceed half a million dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not? Did you ever hear how much the court-house in Macoupin County, Ill., cost?

Mr. LOWDEN. I have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They started out to build a $100,000 court-house and ended by building one that cost a million and a half, did they not?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes; something like that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, suppose you get an authorization for $500,000, for one year. Under the estimates of the Secretary of State, some architect goes to work and draws plans that will necessitate an expenditure of three-quarters of a million or a million dollars on the building. When you have spent the half million you will be back here asking Congress to appropriate this other quarter or half million to keep what you have already appropriated for from going to rack and ruin.

Mr. LOWDEN. If we come back with that sort of a proposition on any appropriation bill, it will be subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman's recollection accord with mine, that the most expensive of all the propositions submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs during the last Congress for the purchase of an embassy building amounted to $400,000?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did that include the site and building?

Mr. LOWDEN. The whole thing, except the furniture, and I am not sure that that was not in it, too.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course I am not posted as to real estate values in those foreign capitals. The intention of the committee is good, and that is to put our foreign representatives in such a position that a poor man can go over there and serve, if he has brains enough for the post. I want to ask you this question: Suppose you build an embassy costing three or four hundred thousand dollars, who is going to maintain the embassy?

Mr. LOWDEN. In the way of repairs?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the way of furniture and servants and plate, and all of the other paraphernalia that go with an embassy.

Mr. LOWDEN. I should suppose it would be the duty of the Government to make repairs and to provide the general furniture, but that so far as servants were concerned the ambassador would maintain them just as he does now. The only suggestion that was ever made to me by anyone in the State Department was that we ought, perhaps, in some of the most expensive places to furnish light and heat, but no one has ever suggested to the committee, and the committee has never entertained the idea, that beyond that the Government would be called upon to pay any other expenses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do not the committee think it would work the way the White House has worked, that you would gradually add this thing and that thing and the other thing until you have added five times as much as the original cost?

Mr. LOWDEN. I think this: Not one dollar will be expended until appropriated by Congress. I have confidence enough in Congress, which, under the law, has absolute control of this whole matter, to assume that it will not go on enlarging from year to year unless there is an absolute need for it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. I am not trying to bother the gentleman; I am trying to get information.

Mr. LOWDEN. I understand that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you build these embassies and the Government does not pay the expenses, such as I have suggested, then is not your ambassador in his latter condition worse than in the first?

Mr. LOWDEN. By no means. I tried to meet that a little bit earlier, in this way. The embassies we will build will not be palaces, like those of the other countries in Europe. No one contemplates that. They will be America's homes. One floor will be closed, except during the three or four days of the year when it is incumbent upon a representative of this country, if he is going to represent it well, to entertain other officials. Then he will open that floor. When that entertainment is over, for all ordinary things, he will simply live on the floor above, just as is done in the other homes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The highest salary received by any representative abroad now is $17,500, is it not?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe a man can afford to live in a $250,000 or $300,000 house with an income of only $17,500 a year?

Mr. LOWDEN. If he does not have to pay rent, much better than he lives now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If he had to pay the ordinary expenses of running the house, would he do it?

Mr. LOWDEN. I have not the slightest doubt of it, and every representative in our foreign service that I have talked with has told me that they would be infinitely better off without any increase in salary than they are now. Rents are very high in the capitals of Europe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question: Does not the gentleman think it would be better to abolish the diplomatic corps absolutely? It has outgrown its usefulness; it is archaic. Then, when there was any special occasion for a representative to a foreign country, appoint a man of great distinction and ability and give him plenty of money to live in the style that you desire while he is on that special mission.

Mr. LOWDEN. I do not, for this reason: Really the most useful function of a foreign representative is not simply to negotiate some special thing with which he has been intrusted, but it is to live among the people, to learn what he can, and to advise his country on his own initiative from time to time of the conditions which will enable us to act intelligently. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think that they perform any valuable function since the ocean cables were laid?

Mr. LOWDEN. I do think that they perform very valuable functions. I wish to remind the gentleman that when business houses find it necessary in simple negotiations to employ the personal element, when they do not go into an important contract with some other man or corporation by correspondence, cable or telegram, but send one of their best men there, as long as human nature justifies the business man in doing that, we never will be able to dispense with the personal element in our foreign relations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Another question: Does not the gentleman think it would be better to take the money that we spend on the diplomatic corps and spend it on the consular corps, the men that are out for business?

Mr. LOWDEN. I think both have important influence even on business.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LOWDEN. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the committee has considered at all the question of the order in which these buildings are to be erected? I mean by that that there are 21 governments on the American Continent at which we maintain a diplomatic representative. There are, perhaps, a fewer number, but more important, in other countries where we maintain a diplomatic representative.

Now, the purpose of the diplomatic corps, as I understand it, is to maintain peace and maintain pleasant relations between the two countries and develop commercial relations. Our trade with South America is growing rapidly, and I am a little bit jealous in this matter to see that some steps are taken to take care of the relations with South and Central America. And also can the gentleman tell me, if he has the information, how the compensation of our diplomatic representatives compare with that of much less important countries in the matter of population and wealth?

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, answering the first question, I will say that the committee has not considered the order in which it would make the recommendation of the capitals to be taken up, for the reason that if we were to say that we wanted to begin with Mexico or Vienna or Paris, it would be very difficult to negotiate and get what we wanted there at a fair price. The way we expect to do it—and I assume that the gentleman from Texas might be interested in the embassy of Mexico—would be to take the matter up with the State Department. If the gentleman is interested somewhere else he would make a recommendation to the State Department upon this as he does upon other things. Then the committee, if it agreed with the State Department, would no doubt follow the order which had been suggested by him.

Now, with reference to the gentleman's second question, there is no question but that there are first-class nations, and some that are not regarded as first class, which are very much more liberal with their representatives than we have ever been.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that under the practice that has for some years prevailed it is practically impossible for a man with small means to occupy one of the first-class European diplomatic positions?

Mr. LOWDEN. It is; there is no question about that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Unless we do something of this kind, unless we relieve them one way or the other, it is a declaration, in substance, that we prefer that that practice shall be continued?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LOWDEN. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that I think I can throw a little light on his question. A certain place was offered to us for one of our ministers for $200,000. It was quite a handsome place, with ample grounds, and worthy of the dignity of our Nation. We declined it. France afterwards, within a very short time, paid $400,000 for the place for the French ambassador. I visited one of our ministers in a very important place and found that he was going to spend his entire first year's salary in fitting up, not for rent, but for occupation, this place, just outside of the town.

I went to another place where we had a first-class consulate, or a consul-general, and found that his predecessor was living in a place in Venice on the canal with wooden shutters, a place I would not use as a dog kennel. Our representative who was there at the time I made my visit had gone into his own pocket, and he had a very decent place. Either we have to properly provide for our representatives abroad, or we have got to send only men there who have means to pay outside of what the Government allows them. I want to say just one word more, and I want the gentleman to bear in mind, as I think we all do, or once in a while, that the impression which our representative produces upon the people where he lives is the impression that this Nation produces upon them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey one question, solely for information. When did the condition arise that a man of ordinary means or a man of no means at all could not go abroad as the representative of the United States and hold his own?

Mr. WILEY. I can not answer the gentleman's conundrum. Somebody else may be able to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like really to know that.

Mr. WILEY. I know they can not do it now. I have been in the habit of going to our representatives abroad, whenever I have been there for the last twenty years, simply because I wanted to know how we were represented.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never have heard that question raised either in Congress or outside of Congress until five or six years ago.

Mr. WILEY. What was that?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is, that nobody but a rich American could afford to take one of these offices.

Mr. WILEY. Well, it is true. All you have got to do in comparison is to see what other nations pay their representatives. Then the gentleman will understand.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask this question, speaking about a poor man holding one of these offices: What poor man ever had a chance to get a place? Those places always go to somebody who has made a big political campaign contribution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no; my colleague is mistaken about that. Some of the most distinguished representatives abroad from this country were poor men. James Russell Lowell was one of them, and William H. Prescott was another.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. When?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, my recollection is that Mr. Lowell was ambassador to the Court of St. James during Grant's term.

Mr. FASSETT. Grant's second term.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether his judgment does not coincide with mine, that the most serious question which has been raised about this project is the question as to whether a poor man could live in one of these two or three or four hundred thousand dollar houses when we put them up. And I want to ask him whether he has had any experience, as some of the rest of us have had, in living abroad and in housekeeping abroad, and if he has, whether he does not agree with me that whereas rents are proportionately as high in most of the countries of Europe as they are here, the cost of living in foreign countries, the wages of servants, and the cost of horses and carriages and other things necessary to maintain a diplomatic establishment, are from one-half to one-quarter the cost they are in the United States?

Mr. LOWDEN. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that I have never lived abroad, but I think that, certainly so far as the wages of servants and that sort of thing are concerned, the gentleman's statement is correct.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if I understood him to state that the cost of servants abroad is from one-quarter to one-half what it is in this country?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that has been my experience. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOWDEN. Certainly.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. I want to know whether the main object of this bill is not to have money on hand in case you can buy a property at a bargain. I know that two or three years ago we could have bought a splendid property for this very purpose in Berlin for about $150,000 or $200,000, but we had no money appropriated for that purpose, and I believe the main object is now to have money on hand in case a bargain offers.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose this measure for a few moments only. I have before me the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of date December 6, 1909. Under the law it is the duty of the different heads of departments, as shown on page 1009, volume 31, United States Statutes at Large, the following:

That hereafter it shall be the duty of the heads of the several departments and of other officers authorized or required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 15th day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service to be included in the Book of Estimates.

Pursuant to the law the Secretary of the Treasury made his estimates. I call upon any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to find a single line or word where the Secretary of State has submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury, under the law, has submitted an estimate for the doing of what this committee now seeks to do.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Would that affect the validity of the act if Congress in its wisdom should decide to make any appropriation it pleases? Would that affect the validity of the appropriation in any way?

Mr. PRINCE. It would not; I am frank to say that.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I wish to say, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, that we are making no appropriation here. We are simply laying a foundation so that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may hereafter in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill insert an item, if there is a recommendation for it, providing for the purchase of buildings for the use of embassies without having that item subject to the point of order.

Mr. PRINCE. There is no question about what you are seeking to do, and I want to say to you frankly my colleague from Illinois has been very frank, as he always is, in stating his position to this House. He has told you what it would cost to provide one building, and he has told you it would run for a series of years.

He has not, in the slightest degree, kept anything from the committee, and for that reason he is to be commended; but I am calling attention to the fact that there was no submission of this question to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There was no estimate; there was no effort or move on the part of the Secretary of State, as successor to others who have held that office for one hundred and twenty years, asking for the doing of this act. Now, why do you want to do it now?

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Wait a moment.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if we are to understand by this that the State Department does not approve of this proposed legislation. This bill was brought in only after it had had full consideration by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and that committee had listened to the Secretary of State, and the provisions of this bill have been submitted to him and have received his approval.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, that may all be true, and I am not going to dispute that; but the committee report, which I hold in my hand, does not show a single word of that to this committee that we are now in.

If you will notice the reports of some of the committees of this House, they print the letters, they print the views, they print the judgment of the executive branch of the Government, in order to show that the executive branch of the Government commend the doing of what you are seeking to do. Not a syllable of that can you find in this report, not a syllable or a word can you find in your report which justifies you in taking the position you do before this committee. You are asking this House to enter upon a policy of building one building which, as the chairman has frankly said, would, perhaps, cost $500,000. You want to build buildings not in the United States. The people of the United States all over the country want public buildings, and you deny to them the public buildings, but you propose to build public buildings elsewhere than in our respective districts in the United States.

Mr. LOWDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. LOWDEN. Would not these questions you put be more proper if they were put when we ask for an appropriation? As a matter of fact, I may say that the report is simply a formal report, and every Secretary of State since I have been here, and some of them before, have been heartily in favor of this project.

Mr. PRINCE. They may be as to private conversations, but I want the officers of this Government, who are equally responsible with me, a coordinate branch of this Government, who under the law should make an estimate to me, to step up to the captain's office and take the responsibility with me when they ask me to appropriate to the extent of $500,000 or $10,000,000.

Mr. LOWDEN. We do not ask you to do it.

Mr. PARSONS. What law would require the Secretary of State to give an estimate preparatory to this present bill?

Mr. PRINCE. We are constantly being asked in the Military Committee to make appropriations—make an appropriation for Corregidor Island, to make an appropriation for this, that, and the other, and where is the law for it? Read these estimates [indicating] and see how many different estimates there are of matters that are to be brought in because there is a need for them. Find for me, if you can, an estimate, a scintilla, or a word where the Secretary of State asks, or the Secretary of the Treasury asks, for the doing of this.

Mr. PARSONS. We are not making an appropriation. That to which you refer is headed "Estimate of appropriation."

Mr. PRINCE. Very well. What does this mean, "For the purchase or erection of an embassy, legation, and consular buildings abroad?" Are you going to purchase a building?

Mr. PARSONS. No.

Mr. PRINCE. What are you going to do with the $500,000?

Mr. PARSONS. We are not appropriating the $500,000.

Mr. PRINCE. Are you not beginning with this $500,000 to lay the foundation to build public embassies?

Mr. PARSONS. You can not find in that bill an appropriation of $500,000. There the bill is. Find it, if you can.

Mr. PRINCE. I know; but here is your report. You propose to start in upon a policy of this kind. You propose to appropriate, as the chairman has frankly said, and for which he is to be commended, for a building to cost $500,000, where it may cost that amount in some of the capitals in Europe. Then——

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. DENBY. The gentleman is absolutely wrong in his statement. The gentleman states that we propose to appropriate. We do not propose to appropriate one penny. We propose to pass a bill whereby in the future, when the Secretary of State has sent in his recommendations and his estimates and they have been submitted to Congress and duly passed upon, we can then pass the legislation necessary and appropriate the money without the action being subject to a point of order. But this bill that is up here to-day does not appropriate one penny.

Mr. BUTLER. It whets our appetite.

Mr. PRINCE. Now, let us not dodge. If this bill becomes a law, it will authorize the Secretary of State to make an appropriation, or provides for appropriation——

Mr. DENBY. Not a bit.

Mr. PARSONS. Not at all.

Mr. PRINCE (continuing). And requests Congress to carry out the provisions of this for $500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not afraid of Congress, is he?

Mr. PRINCE. Let me tell you——

Mr. MADDEN. It says that the Secretary of State can request Congress to make an appropriation. Is the gentleman afraid that Congress will make an appropriation unless it is necessary?

Mr. PRINCE. I can only say this to the gentleman, that I remember distinctly of being a member of the Military Committee when it was said that the War College here in this city could be built for $400,000. It has cost over $800,000.

Mr. MANN. That is because you did not have a proper bill like this.

Mr. PRINCE. We limited them, and we are seeking to limit them right along. I heard my colleague tell not long ago how the Agricultural building was erected, namely, one wing one way and another wing another way, and there would have to be a center erected in that; and yet he and I sat here in this House and either were guilty of voting for it or did not know enough to vote against it.

Mr. SABATH. I have heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], the other gentleman [Mr. MANN], and the third gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] state that this bill limits the cost of these buildings. Now, I ask you, in your opinion, whether it does limit the cost of these buildings?

Mr. PRINCE. In my judgment, from reading it, it does not.

Mr. SABATH. That is my opinion.

Mr. PRINCE. That is not all. Now, you are going to erect a building. You are going to start out with a $500,000 building.

Mr. SABATH. Is there anything that is going to prevent the erection of a building that would cost a million, or, say, a million and a half of dollars?

Mr. PRINCE. If there is not enough, you gentlemen would only have to wait for another year, and after you got started you would claim that we should not destroy it, because you have commenced to build it.

Mr. LOWDEN. I would like to ask my colleague if he will kindly explain——

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; I will if I can get a little order.

Mr. LOWDEN. When only $500,000 can be appropriated in one year, and before it is appropriated the Secretary of State has got to make an estimate, with a provision in the bill that the estimate shall not thereafter be exceeded except by a new authorization, will he kindly explain how there can ever be more than $500,000 expended, unless Congress repeals the law that I am offering to-day?

Mr. PRINCE. I have long been a Member of this House, and I have noticed that after a commission has once been appointed it is next to impossible to kill it. I have seen a bill come in where they started with a certain appropriation, and it turned out that it was hardly enough to meet the fancy notions of the architect; where it was once started, they could always get an additional appropriation for that building. That is my experience as a Member and the experience of every other Member who has served several years in this House. My colleague says it is an appropriation.

I stated so to this House. There is no use "polyfoxing" and playing the cuttlefish. You can not cuttlefish with men in the country. Here is a proposition to expend $500,000 in a house for a man who is receiving a salary of $17,500 a year. You say no poor man can go there. If no poor man can go there, then you are giving additional benefit to a rich man, are you not? [Applause.] What else is it? Do you want to do it? If you do want to do it, vote for it with your eyes open.

Now, let us go a little further. Some of the ablest men that we have ever had abroad were not rich men.

Mr. PARSONS. Who?

Mr. PRINCE. Benjamin Franklin, Elihu B. Washburn, of Illinois. There is a long line of distinguished men who in days gone by, not discrediting the men now, went abroad on account of the gray matter in their heads and their ability to manage great diplomatic questions.

There never was a greater diplomat in the world than lived here in the city of Washington, John Hay, formerly of Illinois, and he lived in his own house. He did not ask the Government to build him one. What excuse can there be of wanting to furnish the ambassadors abroad with a house at the Government's expense if the Secretary of State in Washington, dealing with all the ambassadors and representatives from all the countries here at the seat of government, should not have a house in which to live himself?

But let us go a little further. Five hundred thousand dollars for the house. How much for the furnishings? How much for the maintenance? My colleague stated frankly that he would be in favor of maintaining them according to the dignity of their station. We have here in the city one executive office, not a $500,000 establishment, but that one executive office owned by the Government, and I am creditably informed it costs between two and three hundred thousand dollars a year toward maintaining and running that one institution. [Applause.] Will it cost any less abroad? Will it cost any less for these men to maintain such an establishment on an equal footing with the dignity of this Government and with the dignity of other governments?

Mr. BUTLER. It costs more abroad.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; a very splendid argument is made in favor of labor organizations; that our servants who work are able to get four times as much as abroad; and that has been confessed by gentlemen on the other side, and I subsequently reiterated it.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman listened to what I said, he would be aware of the fact that when I was speaking of the cost of living abroad I was not playing politics.

But I especially call attention to the fact, while the cost of living abroad is infinitely cheaper than in this country, that the reason for it is the tariff. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PRINCE. That may be what you think.

Now, let us go a little further. According to the estimate of appropriations for last year, they were $1,008,000,000.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. According to the argument that the gentleman replied to, made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], to which I do not assent, if that argument is to be maintained, that things are so much cheaper abroad than here, for $500,000 abroad, at the same ratio, you would erect a building equal to a $2,000,000 building here, would you not?

Mr. PRINCE. That is a matter of calculation. You and I are not for the building at all.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly. I am against the bill; but I merely wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if building was so much cheaper there, and material was so much cheaper, you would have in the capitals of the Old World buildings that were worth in reality $2,000,000, according to American standards.

Mr. PRINCE. Then it would cost that much more to maintain it. Now, the figures for 1908–9 are $1,008,000,000. The estimate for this fiscal year is $1,044,000,000. We have to pay out, according to the estimates made, $32,000,000 more this year than we paid out last year, and I want to show you how the lid is being kept down. According to the statement of February 28, 1910, the total disbursements for this year are $452,000,000. The total disbursements for last year up to this time were $453,000,000; and there is $32,000,000 more this year to be paid out than last year. Yet we have held it down up to this point. Do you not think there will have to be a pay day between now and the 1st of July, when this $32,000,000 will have to be paid? There is now a deficit of $24,000,000.

On the 28th of February, 1910—and we might as well read it here as Republicans, to the country, as to have it read later—the disbursements exceeded the receipts by $798,000. Almost a million dollars more was paid out than we got in. Now, if we are paying out about what we are getting in, if we have appropriated $32,000,000 more this year than we did last year, at the end of the year where will we be? I say to you frankly, as a member of the committee, and I say it to the country, the President of the United States wisely and justly, in my judgment, tried to pare down the expenses of this Government. He has cut to the quick almost, and I am not going to be a member of a coordinate branch that will swell the appropriations over what he and the department of which he is the chief says ought to be appropriated. I am not going to the country, and I hope my colleagues will not be put in the attitude of going to the country, and showing that they have been untrue to the President, untrue to his policy of economy, but that on every conceivable occasion, against the judgment of the departments, they have added here and they have added there; and this is the beginning of the putting of the nose of the camel in the tent; that means twenty years of appropriation, in my judgment, of $500,000 a year, as the report says, or $10,000,000. I make the statement now that if this measure becomes a law no man in this country will see less than $20,000,000 appropriated for this very purpose, and I am not for it. The country is not ready for it, and I do not believe in it.

Mr. FASSETT. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. FASSETT. How much did their bill, as reported, exceed the estimate?

Mr. PRINCE. I think our bill exceeded the estimate probably $400,000.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; less than that—about $300,000.

Mr. PRINCE. About $300,000. Let me tell you and be frank with you about that. You have the right to know.

Mr. FASSETT. How much, as it was agreed to in conference, does it exceed the estimates?

Mr. PRINCE. It has not been agreed to in conference yet, but it is practically very little more. I think, on the whole, it is about the same.

Mr. MANN. It was agreed to in conference more than a week ago.

Mr. PRINCE. No; not wholly.

Mr. MANN. Enough to carry it away beyond.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well. Now let me answer your question. The President of the United States asked the heads of departments in the War Department to furnish him an estimate in April or in May. They made estimates in April or May to the Secretary of War.

The Secretary of War, basing upon those estimates, made a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the estimates came in this book. When we met in December we called the Quartermaster-General before the committee and asked him if that estimate could be carried out as made, and he frankly said no. The same thing came from the Secretary of War, and to the credit of the chairman of the Military Committee he was holding it exactly to what the President said, and the President's official had to change the amount or else the Military Committee would never have changed it by a solitary cent. Is that an answer to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FASSETT. It was an abundant answer when the gentleman said that it was $526,000 above the estimate.

Mr. PRINCE. I did not say $526,000; I said $300,000, and it is all explained in the hearings, because it was the extra expense on account of the cost of living for their rations. If gentlemen will read that bill and read the hearings they will see that there never has been brought into this House a better bill than the chairman of the Military Committee brought in this year, or one more along the lines of economy.

Mr. FASSETT. It is a good bill, but we could build an embassy with what you raised the bill above the estimate.

Mr. MANN. Nobody has criticised the bill.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, you started out to criticise it, and then withdrew it. Now, you go further and you say there ought to be houses for these men because it takes a man of distinction. I want to say to you, my colleagues, that there are men sitting in this House, few in number; there are men sitting in yonder House, few in number, that are worth to themselves outside of this body from $50,000 to $100,000 a year. I am not one of them, but there are men sitting in the Cabinet that are worth $75,000 to $100,000 to themselves if they wanted to go out, and yet they accept small sums as a salary. Why? Because it is a distinguished honor to stand as a Member or sit in the seat as a Member of the House of Representatives or in the Senate of the United States.

It is a great honor to sit upon the bench. There are men sitting on the bench yonder drawing a small salary who are capable of drawing as large a compensation as the lawyers who appear before them.

No; it is not a question of money. It is a question of service to your country; and I do not believe that the strong men want to get money out of the holding of a distinguished office for the benefit of their country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINCE. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman makes a pretty strong argument in favor of the bill because he alludes to the fact that every other office in this country can be held by a poor man. The facts are that these are the only offices under this Government which can not be held by a poor man.

Mr. PRINCE. I am inclined to think if we had men who knew at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning where they were, whose minds were clear, in these positions, we would be much better off. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio how many of these positions there are that a poor man can occupy?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In my judgment, no one but a very rich man can accept any ambassadorship. In my opinion, there are some positions of ministers that can be held by a comparatively poor man, and many consulships.

Mr. BUTLER. How about the ambassador at Berlin?

Mr. LONGWORTH. He is a man comparatively well off, although not a rich man.

Mr. PRINCE. I want to say one word, Mr. Chairman, in closing. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], I think, has summed it all up, showing that these places are not places for poor men. Then, the argument of building a house for a poor man falls to the ground. All there is left is the argument for the rich man, who is getting a salary of $17,500, employing help at a low rate, living at a much cheaper cost than he can here, that he shall be furnished rent free by the Government with a $500,000 house, equipped, furnished, and maintained at the cost of the Government of the United States. I am not in favor of such legislation. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13410) to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War.

PURCHASE OR ERECTION OF EMBASSY, LEGATION, AND CONSULAR BUILDINGS ABROAD.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire in foreign countries such sites and buildings as may be appropriated for by Congress for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States, and to alter, repair, and furnish the said buildings, suitable buildings for this purpose to be either purchased or erected, as to the Secretary of State may seem best, and all buildings so acquired for the diplomatic service shall be used both as the residences of diplomatic offices and for the office of the diplomatic establishment: Provided, however, That not more than the sum of one million dollars shall be expended in any fiscal year under the authorization herein made: And provided further, That in submitting estimates of appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State shall set forth a limit of cost for the acquisition of sites and buildings, and for the construction, alteration, repair, and furnishing of buildings at each place in which the expenditure is proposed, which limit of cost shall not thereafter be exceeded in any case, except by new and express authorization of Congress.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "one million" and insert "five hundred thousand."

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to correct a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, strike out in line 11, where it first occurs, the word "offices" and insert the word "officials," so that it will read "residences of diplomatic officials."

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, from the arguments presented in the House pro and con upon this bill it has been clearly shown that it is the intention of a few Members of the House, backed up by outside influence, to build castles abroad in which the servants of the people of this country are supposed to live. Sir, think of the toiling masses of this country, the man who follows the plow, the man who digs with the pick, the sewing woman who wears her life away in some garret den trying to eke out a living with her needle, being called upon to pay their proportionate share of the taxes of the Government, their proportionate share of the amount of money to be put into these buildings that are to cost $500,000 apiece—castles, as I said a while ago, for servants of the American people to live in. Why, sir, as one of the humblest Members of this House, as one of the humblest American Representatives on this floor, I protest against such extravagance at the expense of the people, and I ask those who believe in humanity, those who believe in justice to all classes of our people, to vote to support my amendment to strike out the enacting clause, and put an end to the wild extravagance of this bill now and forever.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MACON) there were—ayes 63, noes 59.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed Mr. MACON and Mr. LOWDEN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 65.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the House concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15814) for the purchase or erection of embassy, legation, and consular buildings abroad and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union striking out the enacting clause, with the recommendation that the amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on concurring to the action of the committee in striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. PRINCE rose.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that under the rule and practice the gentleman is not entitled to recognition at this time if some other gentleman, opposed to the bill, desires recognition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole House reports, through its chairman, that that committee struck out the enacting clause. Now, while the Chair is supposed not to know, and does not know as Speaker, upon whose motion the enacting clause was stricken out, or what discussion took place in the Committee of the Whole House, yet that action is evidently adverse to the bill, and therefore the Chair would recognize an opponent of the bill.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the action of the Committee of the Whole House, and upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves the previous question on concurring to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House, pending which motion the gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and a division was demanded by Mr. LOWDEN.

The House divided.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the ayes are 62 and the noes are 88, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on that vote.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the result of the vote had been announced before the demand was made, and that the demand comes too late.

The SPEAKER. Pending which the Chair, by unanimous consent, will announce the following change of reference.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13317) authorizing a credit in certain accounts of the Treasurer of the United States; from the Union Calendar to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the result of the vote was announced in the House and the result declared before the demand was made for the yeas and nays, and that, therefore, the demand for the yeas and nays comes too late.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the gentleman is in time in his demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the Chair had announced that the House had refused to adjourn. Therefore, the demand for the yeas and nays comes too late.

Mr. MANN. Why, the Chair always announces the vote whenever the call for the yeas and nays is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read:

The yeas and nays may be demanded while the Speaker is demanding the result of a division, while a vote by tellers is being taken, and even after the announcement of the vote, if the House has not passed to other business.

Now, the matter of unanimous consent, the change of reference which the Chair submitted to the House, the Chair would not consider as "other business," because the whole thing was done by unanimous consent and as a matter of convenience to fix the calendar. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is in time with his demand for the yeas and nays.

The gentleman from Kentucky will recollect until the vote was announced the House could not tell what the vote was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has not the practice come to be by the present occupant of the chair, and all of his predecessors, so far as I know, that the announcement of the vote has been made this way, "The ayes seem to have it;" and then the Chair waits long enough for somebody to call for a division or the yeas and nays, and, nobody interrupting, he announces "the ayes have it."

Mr. MANN. You do not do that on a division.

The SPEAKER. This is viva voce and there may be a further division, and if it is not demanded of course a further division can not be had; but this is a constitutional provision, and the Chair and all previous Speakers have always construed it liberally, as the Chair read from the Manual.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. After the division and the Chair's announcement of the vote and before he declared "the noes have it" the gentleman should have demanded the yeas and nays, but the Chair, without any interruption and with great deliberation, then proceeded to say "therefore the House refuses to adjourn," and in the interim between the announcement of the vote and the declaration of the Chair "that the House therefore refuses to adjourn" the call for the yeas and nays not being made according to the practice of this House it now comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read section 6040 of Hinds's Precedents.

The Clerk read as follows:

The yeas and nays may be demanded even after the announcement of a vote if the House has not passed to other business. On February 4, 1850, Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, offered these resolutions. * * *

Mr. Samuel W. Inge, of Alabama, moved that the resolutions be laid on the table. The question was taken, and was declared by the Speaker to have been rejected, when Mr. Joseph M. Root, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, submitted that after the House had acted on the motion to lay on the table, had rejected it, and after that decision had been announced by the Chair, it was not in order for a gentleman to insist upon a second vote being taken by a demand for the yeas and nays. Each Member had a constitutional right to call for the yeas and nays, but he must do so before the question has been determined. The House could not be compelled in this matter to vote a second time. The Speaker said that the practice adopted by his immediate predecessor, and in the propriety of which he concurred, drew a distinction between a demand for the yeas and nays and other cases. When a demand for the yeas and nays was made the question was entertained at any time before the House had passed to other business. The Chair entertained the motion.

The SPEAKER. There are a number of other precedents to the same effect. This ruling was by Speaker Cobb, of Georgia. The Chair thinks the demand for the yeas and nays is in time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 123, answered "present" 8, not voting 158, as follows:
